Faculty and Curriculum Changes— Science Basis of Theology.

New Haven, Sept. 20 (Special).—Preparations are well under way for the formal beginning of the school year at Yale on Thursday morning.

The university will practically be in charge of Anson Phelps Stokes, Jr., secretary, a large part of the faculty and curriculum changes.

Judged by the statistics from the entrance examination papers already taken, Yale will continue its uninterrupted record of a healthy increase in membership of some four hundred students.

In no department have such aggressive measures been taken for a radical change to go into effect this fall as in the Divinity School.

Extensive alterations have been made in Law Hall, one of the largest dormitories on the campus. The two summer departments have closed.

ARMY'S REPLY TO SIMS.

GUNNERY CONTROVERSY.

Board of Brigadier Generals Will Answer the Naval Critic.

(From The Tribune Bureau.)

Washington, Sept. 20.—The General Staff of the army, determined that the "strictures" which have been passed upon army gunnery by Commander Sims, U. S. N., shall be "annihilated," have detailed Brigadier General Arthur Murray, chief of artillery, Brigadier General William Crozier, chief of ordnance, and Brigadier General James Allen, chief of the signal service, to prepare an exhaustive reply to the Sims report, which has created so much excitement and aroused so much indignation in army circles.

Army officers are generally much aroused over what they term the "unwarranted strictures" in the Sims report, and all of them severely condemn the naval officer's inaccuracy and want of logic, although some are disposed to attribute his findings merely to the exuberance of his enthusiasm as director of navy target practice and to the commendation which his work in that capacity has received from the commander in chief.

General Crozier, chief of ordnance, while declining to discuss the Sims report, declares that the army has never had a farebreak from one of its guns, although its officers can produce farebreaks at will. Other artillery officers declare with even greater emphasis that there is no necessity whatever for farebreaks, and all seem to think the navy would do well to correct this disastrous form of accident in its own turn before attempting to secure the adoption of its system of gunnery by the army.

The prospect that the coast defence artillery will be transferred from the army to the navy in perhaps the not distant future adds to the interest which attends the controversy, and field artillery men find pleasure in taunting the coast artillery men with remarks about the time when they will be under the jurisdiction of the navy, and may even have to conduct their target practice and gunnery under the supervision of Commander Sims.

When the attention of an army officer was called to-day to the fact that the navy had to its credit a record of 11 shots and 11 hits in one minute, made with a pinch gun on the Maryland, that on the battleship Maine a record of 10.41 shots a minute had been made with the same sized gun, and that a pinch gun on the battleship Missouri had penetrated the target at the rate of 10.30 shots a minute, that with a 3-pounder the Virginia had to her credit a record of 20 hits with 20 shots in 75 seconds and another 3-pounder had made 10 hits with 10 shots in 22.4 seconds, the officer gave evidence of impatience. "Of course, you do not understand," he said, "how those records were made. The navy is not anxious to call that public. These fine records are all 'framed up' and everything is carefully planned so as to produce the best results.
