

FUNERAL OF THE MURDERED KING AND CROWN PRINCE OF PORTUGAL IN THE CHURCH OF ST. VINCENT, LISBON.

On February 8 the bodies of the King and Crown Prince were removed in solemn procession from the Necessidades Palace to the Church of St. Vincent, the ancient mausoleum of the House of Braganza. The coffins were laid on a sloping bier beneath the dome. The walls of the building were hung with draperies of black and silver, purple and gold, and the wreaths sent by the sovereigns of foreign countries hung from the pillars and were laid against the altar rails. Between the two coffins lay a huge floral cross. The blossoms on the King's side were purple, those on the Crown Prince's white. In the centre at the foot of the catafalque were the officials of the royal household, foreign representatives sat on the right of the chancel, and the Corps Diplomatique occupied the north transept. Prince Arthur of Connaught represented King Edward. The requiem was intoned by the Patriarch of Lisbon. According to the Catholic ritual, all the mourners carried lighted candles, which they extinguished after the Gospel, relighted for the Sanctus, extinguished at the taking of the chalice and relighted for the five absolutions. Over 300,000 persons viewed the bodies.

a paternal eye on all products of the briny deep. With so many chemists and pure food experts available among the thirty-eight thousand government clerks at Washington the Co-operative Guild store ought to have the most competent supervision in the world. It is feared by some that the experts in a mood of pessimism may put up huge signs inscribed "Poison," and condemn and confiscate everything in their own shop.

An Englishman of much co-operative experience is the manager of the guild. The auditor is the only salaried official. Of course, the clerks and other employes in the store are paid. There are price weight scales, so that customers can see the amount and value of their purchases. Once in three months the auditor figures the net profit and divides it proportionately among the customer-stockholders, according to the amount of their purchases. A clerk in the Attorney General's office says this will not be rebating and that the government will not prosecute the profit takers.

Members of Congress who were getting short of change a few years ago by reason of the increased cost of living and the pace set by wealthy poker players from the West would doubtless have been heartily in favor of the guild and would have enrolled themselves as stockholders at that time; but they devised a neater scheme than co-operation by voting to raise their own salaries and making Uncle Sam build them a clubhouse connected by a covered passage with the halls of legislation.
