GREENWICH'S CENTURY.

Gov. Hughes Greets the Villagers on Their Hundredth Anniversary.

Greenwich, N. Y., Aug. 18.—Governor Hughes celebrated the century of the hundredth anniversary of his birth as a village today. He took part in and later reviewed a civic, military and industrial parade, was entertained at luncheon, shook hands with scores of people, addressed a large assemblage at Mowry Park and attended a ball game between the Brooklyn Royal Giants and the local team. Standing in the crowd which surrounded the field the Governor evidenced a keen interest in the game. When he left to board a train for Albany at 5 o'clock the crowd stood 2 to 1 in favor of the Greenwich team.

Probably the proudest, and certainly the oldest, participant in the day's celebration was Harvey Brewer, whose span of life lacks only a few months of that of the village itself. Born in Greenwich on May 18, 1810, Mr. Brewer has never lived more than half a mile from his birthplace. He recalls without a falter the glasses and walks half a mile daily to get his mail. He was given a place of honor in the parade and on the platform, and was introduced to the gathering at the afternoon exercises by Supreme Court Justice C. C. Van Kirk, who presided, as a man who was "just as likely as any of us to see our next centennial."

Governor Hughes and Senator Edgar P. Brackett, of Saratoga, delivered brief addresses after Justice Van Kirk had sketched the accomplishments of village and nation which Harvey Brewer had lived to see. Those who expected the Governor to go into the question of direct nominations heard only an indirect reference to the subject. He said it was not his purpose to discuss political problems on such an occasion.

"This is God's country," said the Governor, "and after traveling seven thousand miles I once more say, 'this is God's country.'" The Governor said that in his Western trip he had been met with inquiries as to what he thought of the country and had found himself reading placards like this: "You'll like this town." Every one, he said, was an enthusiast for his city or town, an enthusiasm because of what had been done, but because of the future.

"We want a great deal more of that right here in the State of New York, than we have had," he said. "We want to boost our towns. We want to show that this state is a place of opportunity, for it is."

The Governor cited Greenwich as an example of a community wide awake, aggressive and eager to let the world know what it is doing. "Don't look with envy at the great cities," he continued. "When the upstate people become restive they go to New York and squeeze the pleasure out of it as they would squeeze the juice out of an orange, throw the peel away and then go home." He admonished his hearers that they should take an interest in the problems of municipalities, for he said the people of the East Side of New York, crowded in their tenements, are your fellow citizens.

"I desire to see the people of the State of New York in charge of their own affairs," he said, in conclusion, "every citizen willing to do his duty having the opportunity that counts his full weight without devoting all his time to political manipulation. I desire to see a pride in all our officers. How many we have faithfully serving the state in legislative halls and in administrative departments! What we want generally recognized is that every man in public office is not a master of the position to hold against the people, but one placed in a position of trust to serve the people according to his best judgment and faithfully execute the statutes and the constitution of the state."

THEODORE MARTIN DEAD

Career of Notable Figure in English Literature.

London, Aug. 18.—The death of Sir Theodore Martin is announced. He was born in 1816. Theodore Martin was the man chosen by Queen Victoria from all the scholars of England to free the memory of the Prince Consort from the prejudice of the British public. General Charles Grey had just begun the task when he died in 1870. His successor took it up, and the first volume of the "Life of the Prince Consort" appeared in 1874, and the last of the five in 1887. The third volume dealt with the delicate subject of the Crimean War, particularly with the feeling of the court during the years leading up to that struggle. With the appearance of this volume arose a great outcry from the Liberals, who declared that it would influence the situation then verging on war between England and Russia. The work as a whole, however, placed the Prince Consort in a truer historical light, and won for his author Knighthood of the Bath.

Nearly forty years before this appeared the popular "Bon Gaultier Ballads," through which the name of Theodore Martin was perhaps most widely known. These were written in collaboration with his friend, Professor W. E. Aytoun, whose life he wrote in later years.

"I have always been a very busy man, and a very busy man I still am," Sir Theodore remarked to a friend one day during his eighty-sixth year, and that statement held good to the end of his ninety-three years of life. As a literary man, he produced upward of twenty volumes, many of them of great length. But they were the product of his spare moments. His chief work was in connection with the firm of Parliamentary solicitors, Martin & Leslie, of which he was the senior partner.

Despite the testimony of his long and strenuous life, he was not a man of strong physique. He was accustomed to give great credit for his health to the care given him by his devoted wife in the half-century of their married life. She was Miss Helena Fauch, a celebrated actress of her day. Their courtship began when she took the leading part in his version of the Danish play, "King René's Daughter."

Sir Theodore inherited his profession from his father, James Martin, a solicitor in Edinburgh, where the son was born. He received his education in the high school and university of that city, and practiced there several years. In 1846 he went to London and found success from the start. He had already begun his literary career as a contributor to "Blackwood's," "Fraser's Magazine" and "Tait's Magazine." It was in this period that the "Bon Gaultier Ballads" began to appear. They were published in book form in 1848, and by 1871 thirteen editions had appeared in England alone. Many other editions have been put out since in both England and America. He and Professor Aytoun also translated together "The Poems and Ballads of Goethe" and "Faust."

One of his most popular translations was the "Odes of Horace," which appeared in 1868. He followed this one year later with a critical essay on the life and writings of Horace in the "Ancient Classics for English Readers" and, in 1882, by a complete translation of the works of Horace, with a life of the poet. His translation of "Catalina" appeared in 1861, followed by a volume of "Poems, Original and Translated." In 1863 he published a translation of Dante's "Vita Nuova." Other translations were Heine's "Poems and Ballads," six books of Virgil's "Æneid" and Leopardi's poems. Other works include "Essays on the Drama," "Madonna Pia and Other Plays," "Life of Lord Lyndhurst" and "Life of Helena Fauch." This last appeared in 1891, three years after Lady Martin's death. In 1866 he published his "Monographs," and in 1898 "Queen Victoria as I Knew Her."

Sir Theodore was rector of St. Andrew's University in Edinburgh, where the degree of LL. D. from the University of Edinburgh was conferred on him in 1882. He was a member of the Royal Victorian Order. He was a member of the Athenæum Club.

BURIAL OF GOLDFINCH

Fresh Air Girls Tribute to Dead Songster—An Appreciation.

"Oo-o-h! Look at the poor little bird!" exclaimed one of the girls at the Shepherd Knapp Home recently, as the children were taking their daily walk. "Isn't that too bad?" Her sharp eyes had discovered a goldfinch lying dead by the roadside. The children gathered around it and gently poked it with a stick.

"One of those boys probably hit it with a stone," said one. "They ought to be ashamed of themselves." "Isn't he pretty, though?" said another. "We ought to bury him. Can we, teacher?" "Yes, if you wish," replied the attendant.

So the girls found a box, and tenderly laying the bird inside, carried it to the home. They dug a grave in the shade of one of the apple trees and gathered flowers and ferns from the fields and woods near by. They placed the bird in the grave and surrounded it with white daisies. Each little girl had a wild rose, which she dropped into the grave until the body of the bird was completely covered. Then they laid more ferns over the roses and threw on the earth.

The little mound which was made by the flowers and ferns was topped off by a string. A bit of pasteboard, on which was printed the word "Birdie," was set at the head of the grave, and goldenrod was strewn around the little plot within the string fence. The children selected goldenrod to decorate the grave because it was a yellow bird, and these flowers seemed to be the most appropriate. After the burial, two little girls stood behind the mound and sang a song about the birds, and then all drew away reluctantly, declaring their purpose to return each day and bring fresh flowers.

IS THE FARMER'S ERA.

Secretary Wilson Gives Interesting Figures of His 12 Years' Service.

Washington, Aug. 18.—During the last twelve years, the period covering the administration of James Wilson as Secretary of Agriculture, the agricultural balance of trade in the United States increased from a yearly average of $25,000,000 to $100,000,000, or 75 per cent, according to the department's year book just made public.

"So increasingly disposed has the public been to ask and receive the aid of this department, and so large have been the new fields of work assigned to it by Congress," says Mr. Wilson, in a résumé of his work, "that the number of employes has increased enormously. On July 1, 1897, 2,444 persons were employed, and eleven years later, in 1908, the number was 10,429, or over four times as many."

Secretary Wilson declares that no one need have fear that the farmers of this country will ever be unable to provide for its population. "They are already demonstrating, in the cases of various crops and of various states," he says, "that they can provide for a population increasing faster than the increase due to excess of births over deaths."

From 1895 to 1906, he says, farm wages increased faster than did prices. In the matter of wage increase, the farm laborer has fared better than the workman employed in manufacturing and mechanical industries.

Death notices appearing in THE TRIBUNE will be reprinted in the Tri-Weekly Tribune without extra charge.
