

King, rector of Trinity Church, will perform the ceremony.

Mr. and Mrs. Henry G. Trevor will spend the summer at Meadowmere, their cottage at Southampton, Long Island.

Mr. and Mrs. Sidney Lanier Smith will close their house in East 33rd street on Friday and go to their country home on the south shore of Long Island for the summer.

Mrs. Samuel Thomas arrives in town today from Washington, and will be at the Plaza for a few days with her daughter-in-law Mrs. E. R. Thomas. They will sail for Europe very soon to join E. R. Thomas.

Mrs. Eben Wright and her daughters will spend the summer at Nahant, Mass.

Mrs. David H. McAlpin has closed her house in West 83rd street, and has gone to Southampton, Long Island, for the season.

IN THE BERKSHIRES.

(By Telegraph to The Tribune.) Lenox, June 4.—The Lenox Golf Show Association has been organized and a bench show will be held in October. The officers of the association are: President, Henry H. Pease; vice-president, William D. Curtis; secretary and treasurer, George Winfield; board of governors, Frederick S. Winfield, Miss Kate Cary, Mrs. Frank Thompson, William B. O. Field, Miss Cora K. Sturgis, James and F. S. Delafeld.

Mrs. Flora Kelsey, of Marcellus, France, and William Merritt Clark, of New York, were married in Lenox today.

Mr. and Mrs. Langdon E. Valentine are guests of Mr. and Mrs. Henry Hollister Pease at the Orchard.

Dr. and Mrs. W. S. Bullard have returned to Boston after several weeks' stay in Lenox.

Mr. and Mrs. Francis Dr. Wissman are expected to-night to be the guests of Mr. and Mrs. Columbus O. DeLisle for the week end.

Mrs. John Stoddard has opened Wyndhurst for the summer. Mrs. Edmund Coffin and Mrs. John Stoddard have arrived there.

John Stoddard, who is visiting Mr. and Mrs. Melville Ingalls, in Cincinnati, will return to Stockbridge Monday.

Mr. and Mrs. W. B. Dinsmore, of Tuxedo Park, Mr. and Mrs. E. Moberly, Miss Park, Mr. and Mrs. E. Moberly, Mr. and Mrs. E. Moberly, Mr. and Mrs. George H. Cobb and Mr. and Mrs. George H. Cobb have arrived at the Curtis Hotel.

Miss Harriet K. Welles is making a motor trip to the northern part of the Berkshires.

Dr. and Mrs. Richard C. Greenleaf have opened Windside, the new country estate. Mrs. O'Brien Wood has arrived to spend the summer with her daughter, Mrs. E. T. Rice.

Mr. and Mrs. J. E. R. Carpenter and Miss Marion Carpenter are at the Red Lion Inn, in Stockbridge.

The marriage of Miss Kathleen Leupp, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. E. Moberly, to Mr. and Mrs. Washington, and Reginald D. Leupp, son of Bishop and Mrs. Johnson, of Pasadena, Cal., will take place next Thursday, at the country home of Mr. and Mrs. Leupp, in Tyringham. Mr. Johnson today joined his parents at Stockbridge.

Mr. and Mrs. Charles Cary Rumsey will remain for a week longer at the Curtis Hotel. Since their arrival on the mountain they have received a stable of riding horses and are making horseback excursions throughout the wilderness on the mountain.

Wednesday Mr. and Mrs. Rumsey fished in Vampire Pond, on the mountain, and took out forty-eight bass and perch. They frequently resort to Lee, where they are always open and sometimes lively.

What the Prince liked was society, in one form or another. The open air life suited him. It was sufficiently formal, but less formal than indoors. He liked strolling about and meeting acquaintances or friends. When you had once seen His Royal Highness leaning against the railings of a villa—the villas stood each in its own grounds—and talking to a lady leaning out of the first floor window—the first floor being the same as the American second—and this interview lasting a quarter of an hour, you felt that the conditions of life and the relations of royalty to other ranks in the world had taken on a quite new shape in Homburg.

But the attitude of respect was maintained. Certain formalities were never forgotten. The Prince was always addressed as "Sir" or as "Your Royal Highness." But these observances were not irksome, nor was conversation restricted or stiffened by the accepted conventionalities which, after all, were mere matters of form than of substance. And in his most careless moods the Prince had a dignity which was the more impressive for being apparently unconscious. Nobody ever forgot what was due to him, or never forgot it twice. It was an offence he did not pardon, or pardoned only in those who could not remember what they had never known. A foreigner, an American, who erred in pure ignorance, might count on forgiveness.

The Prince gave many luncheons and dinners, almost always at Ritter's or at the Kursaal. I should think there was never a day when he did not play the host. The dinners at the Kursaal, given on the terrace, always crowded with other dinner parties. At Ritter's they were on the piazza. This open air hospitality was the pleasantest because it was so seldom possible in England. He had brought the art of entertaining to perfection. He put his guests, even those who stood most in awe of royalty, at their ease. The costume perhaps helped. When a company of people were in dining jackets and the men wearing their soft black hats, even at table, by the Prince's command, etiquette became a less formidable thing. The Prince talked easily, fluently and well. He might ask a guest whom he liked to sit next him, ignoring distinctions of rank, but during the dinner he would talk, but sooner or later, to everybody. There might be a dozen guests, a number seldom exceeded. I will give you one example of the dialogue which went on, and no more. The late Duke of Devonshire, at that time the Marquis of Hartington, was sitting nearly opposite the Prince, but at some little distance, and this colloquy took place:

"Hartington, you ought not to be drinking all that champagne."

"No, sir, I know I oughtn't."

"Then why do you do it?"

"Well, sir, I have made up my mind that I had rather be ill now and then than always taking care of myself."

"Oh, you think that now, but when the good comes what do you think then?"

"You will ask me then I will say, 'I do not anticipate.'"

The Prince laughed and everybody laughed. And Lord Hartington, for all his gout, tried to be as witty as one of the truest Englishmen of his time of any age.

Among the Americans who were presented to the Prince at Homburg were Mr. Depew and Mark Twain. I was not in Homburg when Mr. Depew first came, but I asked one of the Prince's equerries to arrange the presentation for Mr. Depew, and I wrote to Lady Cork, begging her to do what she could for him. So the formalities were duly transacted. The Prince took a liking to the American, asked him to dine, put him on his right hand and listened to his stories with delight. He told me afterward that Depew was a new experience. He asked him again and again, and they next year also, I believe several years, or as long as Depew went to Homburg. The Prince said:

"Depew's stories were not all good, but he told the bad ones so well that they were better than the good."

My letter to Lady Cork had a fate I did not foresee, though I ought to have foreseen. When she told the Prince that I had written her about Depew she had my manuscript in her hand. "Is that Smalley's letter? May I see it?" asked the Prince; took it and read the whole. It happened that I was staying at the time with one of her married daughters, and there was a good deal of family gossip in the air. When the Prince handed it back there was in his eyes a gleam of that humor so often seen there, and he said:

"Now I know some of the things I have been wanting to know."

And Lady Cork answered:

"Sir, we have nothing to conceal from Your Royal Highness."

There was, of course, an intimacy which put the Prince on his honor.

Mark Twain was staying at Naumburg, some twelve miles away. He had driven into Homburg and was wandering about the place when he was pointed out to the Prince, and was presented. Mark Twain had at that time no very great care about his personal appearance, and put aside everything but the essentials. He lived in a hired villa. He wore lounging suits in the daytime—sometimes of a rather flamboyant color—and a soft gray hat. In the evening a black dining jacket, black tie, black waistcoat, black trousers and a soft black Homburg hat. The silk hat and the dress coat and white tie or white waistcoat were unknown. Most of the officers of his household were left at home, but General Stanley Clarke was always with him.

His way of life was as informal as his dress. He was there to amuse himself, and it was an art he understood perfectly. Homburg is a village, but it had, or had at that time, many resources. The three or four streets of which the place consisted were so many rendezvous for the visitors. The lawn tennis grounds were another. The walks in the woods were delightful. There were drives over the hills and far away, in the purest air in Germany. If you tired of the little watering place or its guests, there was Frankfurt, or a more varied kind. But in Homburg itself the Kursaal, though there had been no gambling since 1839, and the hotels were always open and sometimes lively.

What the Prince liked was society, in one form or another. The open air life suited him. It was sufficiently formal, but less formal than indoors. He liked strolling about and meeting acquaintances or friends. When you had once seen His Royal Highness leaning against the railings of a villa—the villas stood each in its own grounds—and talking to a lady leaning out of the first floor window—the first floor being the same as the American second—and this interview lasting a quarter of an hour, you felt that the conditions of life and the relations of royalty to other ranks in the world had taken on a quite new shape in Homburg.

But the attitude of respect was maintained. Certain formalities were never forgotten. The Prince was always addressed as "Sir" or as "Your Royal Highness." But these observances were not irksome, nor was conversation restricted or stiffened by the accepted conventionalities which, after all, were mere matters of form than of substance. And in his most careless moods the Prince had a dignity which was the more impressive for being apparently unconscious. Nobody ever forgot what was due to him, or never forgot it twice. It was an offence he did not pardon, or pardoned only in those who could not remember what they had never known. A foreigner, an American, who erred in pure ignorance, might count on forgiveness.

The Prince gave many luncheons and dinners, almost always at Ritter's or at the Kursaal. I should think there was never a day when he did not play the host. The dinners at the Kursaal, given on the terrace, always crowded with other dinner parties. At Ritter's they were on the piazza. This open air hospitality was the pleasantest because it was so seldom possible in England. He had brought the art of entertaining to perfection. He put his guests, even those who stood most in awe of royalty, at their ease. The costume perhaps helped. When a company of people were in dining jackets and the men wearing their soft black hats, even at table, by the Prince's command, etiquette became a less formidable thing. The Prince talked easily, fluently and well. He might ask a guest whom he liked to sit next him, ignoring distinctions of rank, but during the dinner he would talk, but sooner or later, to everybody. There might be a dozen guests, a number seldom exceeded. I will give you one example of the dialogue which went on, and no more. The late Duke of Devonshire, at that time the Marquis of Hartington, was sitting nearly opposite the Prince, but at some little distance, and this colloquy took place:

"Hartington, you ought not to be drinking all that champagne."

"No, sir, I know I oughtn't."

"Then why do you do it?"

Anglo-American Memories

EDWARD THE SEVENTH AS PRINCE OF WALES—PERSONAL INCIDENTS.

(Copyright, 1910, by George W. Smalley.)

London, May 10.

Everything, or almost everything, has been said about King Edward the Seventh, every tribute paid him from every quarter of the world; and the mourning of his own people is the best tribute of all. I should like to add an estimate from a different point of view and a tribute, but I suppose they would have no proper place in these papers, and I confine myself therefore to memories. I will go back to the period when he was Prince of Wales, and to the place where he put off most of the splendors belonging to his rank, and where most of the man himself was to be seen; not once or twice, but for years in succession.

Homburg was to the Prince of Wales a three weeks' holiday. I do not think he took the medical side of it very seriously. He drank the waters and walked, and the doctors bade him, but with respect to diet he seemed to be his own doctor, and his prescriptions were not severe. But then nobody, the local physicians excepted, ever did take Homburg very seriously as a cure. What the Prince liked was the freedom, of which he was himself the author. On occasions of ceremony and in the general course of his life at home, strict etiquette was enforced. At Homburg the Prince used his dispensing power and put aside everything but the essentials. He lived in a hired villa. He wore lounging suits in the daytime—sometimes of a rather flamboyant color—and a soft gray hat. In the evening a black dining jacket, black tie, black waistcoat, black trousers and a soft black Homburg hat. The silk hat and the dress coat and white tie or white waistcoat were unknown. Most of the officers of his household were left at home, but General Stanley Clarke was always with him.

His way of life was as informal as his dress. He was there to amuse himself, and it was an art he understood perfectly. Homburg is a village, but it had, or had at that time, many resources. The three or four streets of which the place consisted were so many rendezvous for the visitors. The lawn tennis grounds were another. The walks in the woods were delightful. There were drives over the hills and far away, in the purest air in Germany. If you tired of the little watering place or its guests, there was Frankfurt, or a more varied kind. But in Homburg itself the Kursaal, though there had been no gambling since 1839, and the hotels were always open and sometimes lively.

What the Prince liked was society, in one form or another. The open air life suited him. It was sufficiently formal, but less formal than indoors. He liked strolling about and meeting acquaintances or friends. When you had once seen His Royal Highness leaning against the railings of a villa—the villas stood each in its own grounds—and talking to a lady leaning out of the first floor window—the first floor being the same as the American second—and this interview lasting a quarter of an hour, you felt that the conditions of life and the relations of royalty to other ranks in the world had taken on a quite new shape in Homburg.

But the attitude of respect was maintained. Certain formalities were never forgotten. The Prince was always addressed as "Sir" or as "Your Royal Highness." But these observances were not irksome, nor was conversation restricted or stiffened by the accepted conventionalities which, after all, were mere matters of form than of substance. And in his most careless moods the Prince had a dignity which was the more impressive for being apparently unconscious. Nobody ever forgot what was due to him, or never forgot it twice. It was an offence he did not pardon, or pardoned only in those who could not remember what they had never known. A foreigner, an American, who erred in pure ignorance, might count on forgiveness.

The Prince gave many luncheons and dinners, almost always at Ritter's or at the Kursaal. I should think there was never a day when he did not play the host. The dinners at the Kursaal, given on the terrace, always crowded with other dinner parties. At Ritter's they were on the piazza. This open air hospitality was the pleasantest because it was so seldom possible in England. He had brought the art of entertaining to perfection. He put his guests, even those who stood most in awe of royalty, at their ease. The costume perhaps helped. When a company of people were in dining jackets and the men wearing their soft black hats, even at table, by the Prince's command, etiquette became a less formidable thing. The Prince talked easily, fluently and well. He might ask a guest whom he liked to sit next him, ignoring distinctions of rank, but during the dinner he would talk, but sooner or later, to everybody. There might be a dozen guests, a number seldom exceeded. I will give you one example of the dialogue which went on, and no more. The late Duke of Devonshire, at that time the Marquis of Hartington, was sitting nearly opposite the Prince, but at some little distance, and this colloquy took place:

"Hartington, you ought not to be drinking all that champagne."

"No, sir, I know I oughtn't."

"Then why do you do it?"

"Well, sir, I have made up my mind that I had rather be ill now and then than always taking care of myself."

"Oh, you think that now, but when the good comes what do you think then?"

"You will ask me then I will say, 'I do not anticipate.'"

The Prince laughed and everybody laughed. And Lord Hartington, for all his gout, tried to be as witty as one of the truest Englishmen of his time of any age.

Among the Americans who were presented to the Prince at Homburg were Mr. Depew and Mark Twain. I was not in Homburg when Mr. Depew first came, but I asked one of the Prince's equerries to arrange the presentation for Mr. Depew, and I wrote to Lady Cork, begging her to do what she could for him. So the formalities were duly transacted. The Prince took a liking to the American, asked him to dine, put him on his right hand and listened to his stories with delight. He told me afterward that Depew was a new experience. He asked him again and again, and they next year also, I believe several years, or as long as Depew went to Homburg. The Prince said:

"Depew's stories were not all good, but he told the bad ones so well that they were better than the good."

My letter to Lady Cork had a fate I did not foresee, though I ought to have foreseen. When she told the Prince that I had written her about Depew she had my manuscript in her hand. "Is that Smalley's letter? May I see it?" asked the Prince; took it and read the whole. It happened that I was staying at the time with one of her married daughters, and there was a good deal of family gossip in the air. When the Prince handed it back there was in his eyes a gleam of that humor so often seen there, and he said:

"Now I know some of the things I have been wanting to know."

And Lady Cork answered:

"Sir, we have nothing to conceal from Your Royal Highness."

There was, of course, an intimacy which put the Prince on his honor.

Mark Twain was staying at Naumburg, some twelve miles away. He had driven into Homburg and was wandering about the place when he was pointed out to the Prince, and was presented. Mark Twain had at that time no very great care about his personal appearance, and put aside everything but the essentials. He lived in a hired villa. He wore lounging suits in the daytime—sometimes of a rather flamboyant color—and a soft gray hat. In the evening a black dining jacket, black tie, black waistcoat, black trousers and a soft black Homburg hat. The silk hat and the dress coat and white tie or white waistcoat were unknown. Most of the officers of his household were left at home, but General Stanley Clarke was always with him.

His way of life was as informal as his dress. He was there to amuse himself, and it was an art he understood perfectly. Homburg is a village, but it had, or had at that time, many resources. The three or four streets of which the place consisted were so many rendezvous for the visitors. The lawn tennis grounds were another. The walks in the woods were delightful. There were drives over the hills and far away, in the purest air in Germany. If you tired of the little watering place or its guests, there was Frankfurt, or a more varied kind. But in Homburg itself the Kursaal, though there had been no gambling since 1839, and the hotels were always open and sometimes lively.

What the Prince liked was society, in one form or another. The open air life suited him. It was sufficiently formal, but less formal than indoors. He liked strolling about and meeting acquaintances or friends. When you had once seen His Royal Highness leaning against the railings of a villa—the villas stood each in its own grounds—and talking to a lady leaning out of the first floor window—the first floor being the same as the American second—and this interview lasting a quarter of an hour, you felt that the conditions of life and the relations of royalty to other ranks in the world had taken on a quite new shape in Homburg.

But the attitude of respect was maintained. Certain formalities were never forgotten. The Prince was always addressed as "Sir" or as "Your Royal Highness." But these observances were not irksome, nor was conversation restricted or stiffened by the accepted conventionalities which, after all, were mere matters of form than of substance. And in his most careless moods the Prince had a dignity which was the more impressive for being apparently unconscious. Nobody ever forgot what was due to him, or never forgot it twice. It was an offence he did not pardon, or pardoned only in those who could not remember what they had never known. A foreigner, an American, who erred in pure ignorance, might count on forgiveness.

The Prince gave many luncheons and dinners, almost always at Ritter's or at the Kursaal. I should think there was never a day when he did not play the host. The dinners at the Kursaal, given on the terrace, always crowded with other dinner parties. At Ritter's they were on the piazza. This open air hospitality was the pleasantest because it was so seldom possible in England. He had brought the art of entertaining to perfection. He put his guests, even those who stood most in awe of royalty, at their ease. The costume perhaps helped. When a company of people were in dining jackets and the men wearing their soft black hats, even at table, by the Prince's command, etiquette became a less formidable thing. The Prince talked easily, fluently and well. He might ask a guest whom he liked to sit next him, ignoring distinctions of rank, but during the dinner he would talk, but sooner or later, to everybody. There might be a dozen guests, a number seldom exceeded. I will give you one example of the dialogue which went on, and no more. The late Duke of Devonshire, at that time the Marquis of Hartington, was sitting nearly opposite the Prince, but at some little distance, and this colloquy took place:

"Hartington, you ought not to be drinking all that champagne."

"No, sir, I know I oughtn't."

"Then why do you do it?"

"Well, sir, I have made up my mind that I had rather be ill now and then than always taking care of myself."

"Oh, you think that now, but when the good comes what do you think then?"

"You will ask me then I will say, 'I do not anticipate.'"

The Prince laughed and everybody laughed. And Lord Hartington, for all his gout, tried to be as witty as one of the truest Englishmen of his time of any age.

Among the Americans who were presented to the Prince at Homburg were Mr. Depew and Mark Twain. I was not in Homburg when Mr. Depew first came, but I asked one of the Prince's equerries to arrange the presentation for Mr. Depew, and I wrote to Lady Cork, begging her to do what she could for him. So the formalities were duly transacted. The Prince took a liking to the American, asked him to dine, put him on his right hand and listened to his stories with delight. He told me afterward that Depew was a new experience. He asked him again and again, and they next year also, I believe several years, or as long as Depew went to Homburg. The Prince said:

"Depew's stories were not all good, but he told the bad ones so well that they were better than the good."

My letter to Lady Cork had a fate I did not foresee, though I ought to have foreseen. When she told the Prince that I had written her about Depew she had my manuscript in her hand. "Is that Smalley's letter? May I see it?" asked the Prince; took it and read the whole. It happened that I was staying at the time with one of her married daughters, and there was a good deal of family gossip in the air. When the Prince handed it back there was in his eyes a gleam of that humor so often seen there, and he said:

"Now I know some of the things I have been wanting to know."

And Lady Cork answered:

"Sir, we have nothing to conceal from Your Royal Highness."

There was, of course, an intimacy which put the Prince on his honor.

Mark Twain was staying at Naumburg, some twelve miles away. He had driven into Homburg and was wandering about the place when he was pointed out to the Prince, and was presented. Mark Twain had at that time no very great care about his personal appearance, and put aside everything but the essentials. He lived in a hired villa. He wore lounging suits in the daytime—sometimes of a rather flamboyant color—and a soft gray hat. In the evening a black dining jacket, black tie, black waistcoat, black trousers and a soft black Homburg hat. The silk hat and the dress coat and white tie or white waistcoat were unknown. Most of the officers of his household were left at home, but General Stanley Clarke was always with him.

His way of life was as informal as his dress. He was there to amuse himself, and it was an art he understood perfectly. Homburg is a village, but it had, or had at that time, many resources. The three or four streets of which the place consisted were so many rendezvous for the visitors. The lawn tennis grounds were another. The walks in the woods were delightful. There were drives over the hills and far away, in the purest air in Germany. If you tired of the little watering place or its guests, there was Frankfurt, or a more varied kind. But in Homburg itself the Kursaal, though there had been no gambling since 1839, and the hotels were always open and sometimes lively.

What the Prince liked was society, in one form or another. The open air life suited him. It was sufficiently formal, but less formal than indoors. He liked strolling about and meeting acquaintances or friends. When you had once seen His Royal Highness leaning against the railings of a villa—the villas stood each in its own grounds—and talking to a lady leaning out of the first floor window—the first floor being the same as the American second—and this interview lasting a quarter of an hour, you felt that the conditions of life and the relations of royalty to other ranks in the world had taken on a quite new shape in Homburg.

OBITUARY.

EDWARD J. SWARTZ.

Philadelphia, June 4.—Edward J. Swartz, for many years editor of "The Evening Telegraph" and widely known as a dramatic critic, died at his home here to-day of rheumatic gout. In addition to his newspaper work, which extended over forty-four years, Mr. Swartz devoted himself to playwriting. McKee Rankin, James O'Neill, Amy Lee, Annie Pixley and other actors and actresses of prominence appeared in plays of his composition.

Among his dramatic works were "A Square Man," "Dad's Girl," "Princess Chuck," "The Governors," "Our Angel," "The Kaffir Diamond," "The Envoy," "Rosetta's Fairy," "The Clipper" and "The Synagogue."

Mr. Swartz was born in Buffalo sixty-two years ago and came to Philadelphia in 1866. He became connected with "The Evening Telegraph" in that year as a shorthand reporter, and remained continuously with the paper until his death.

DEATH OF MRS. G. L. RONALDS.

Paris, June 4.—Mrs. George Lorillard Ronalds, who before her marriage was Miss Pauline Antoinette Wittmeyer, died here yesterday. Mrs. Ronalds's home was in New York, but she had lived here for several years. A confusion of names resulted in an erroneous report that Mrs. Pierre Lorillard Ronalds had died.

Mrs. George L. Ronalds was the daughter of a wealthy merchant who once owned a house in 34th street, opposite the Waldorf. George Lorillard Ronalds, her husband, was a grandson of the first Pierre Lorillard, who died in 1815.

Mrs. Ronalds for the last fifteen years had lived in Paris. Her only son, George Lorillard Ronalds, of Tuxedo, survives her.

An Associated Press dispatch from Paris yesterday erroneously stated that Mrs. Pierre Lorillard Ronalds, of London, well known as a social leader, was dead. She is a sister-in-law of Mrs. George Lorillard Ronalds.

HUGH TOLER BOORAAE.

Hugh Toler Booraee, who died at Saratoga Lake yesterday, was well known as a writer on subjects pertaining to his profession, although only forty-one years old. He was a member of the firm of Ross & Booraee, of New York, who were architects for the Mutual Life Insurance Company until 1906.

Mr. Booraee was the architect for many of Morris-town's handsome houses, notably those of Richard A. McCurdy and Louis A. Thebaud, and he remodelled the famous old Thomas Nast house for E. M. Johnson. Mr. Booraee is survived by his mother, Mrs. Antoinette Booraee, and two sisters, the Misses Antoinette and Alice P. Booraee, and one brother, Ralph R. Booraee.

ROBERT MARWELL CHESEBROUGH.

Word was received in this city of the death of Robert Marwell Chesebrough, son of Robert A. Chesebrough, inventor and manufacturer of vaseline, at London, England, yesterday. It is believed that the body will be brought to this country.

As a result of continual experiments in distilling petroleum Robert A. Chesebrough discovered and patented in 1859 the substance now known as vaseline. When the value of this product had been ascertained Mr. Chesebrough engaged in its manufacture, and has introduced it not only to the people of the United States, but to the inhabitants of nearly every civilized country.

In 1876 the business was incorporated as the Chesebrough Manufacturing Company, and Mr. Chesebrough has been actively engaged as its head ever since. The family home in this city is at No. 56 East 49th street.

MISS MARY ELIZABETH DEWEY.

Boston, June 4.—The death is announced at her home, in the Back Bay, of Mary Elizabeth Dewey, a well known author. Miss Dewey was born in Gloucester in 1821. She was the translator of George Sand's "Miller of Angibault." Her best known work was "Life and Letters of Catherine M. Sedgwick."

George Cox, one of the oldest citizens of West Hoboken, died suddenly yesterday at his home, in Hudson Boulevard, from heart disease. He was seventy-three years old. His father established a general store in West Hoboken in 1829, and the son succeeded to the business after his father's death and had carried it on ever since. Last Saturday night Mr. Cox celebrated his golden anniversary.

CHARLES L. CHURCH, an old-time minstrel, died in Cambridge, Mass., yesterday, aged seventy-six years. Church was a native of England, going to Baltimore nearly sixty years ago. With the Christy minstrel company and the Morris Brothers' company he toured the United States, taking a leading part in the productions.

THE WEATHER REPORT.

Official Record and Forecast.—Washington, June 4.—Conditions continue unsettled in the middle West, the Gulf states and the Ohio valleys, and during the last twenty-four hours there have been showers and drizzles in the Mississippi and Ohio valleys and Tennessee and scattered showers in the northern plains states. The weather remained fair during Friday night and Saturday in the Atlantic and fair weather continues in the Rocky Mountain and plateau regions and on the Pacific Coast.

A general reaction to higher temperatures has set in over the middle Atlantic states, the Ohio and upper Mississippi valleys and the Pacific Northwest. Higher temperatures are again reported from the Gulf states, the Southwest and the plateau region.

The indications are that the influence of the Western disturbance will extend eastward and cause showers and drizzles in the Mississippi and Ohio valleys, the northern lake region, New England and the northern lake region during the day of the 5th. Fair weather will continue Sunday and Monday in the Atlantic and fair weather is indicated for the Mississippi Valley Monday.

The general reaction to higher temperatures has set in over the middle Atlantic states, the Ohio and upper Mississippi valleys and the Pacific Northwest. Higher temperatures are again reported from the Gulf states, the Southwest and the plateau region.

The indications are that the influence of the Western disturbance will extend eastward and cause showers and drizzles in the Mississippi and Ohio valleys, the northern lake region, New England and the northern lake region during the day of the 5th. Fair weather will continue Sunday and Monday in the Atlantic and fair weather is indicated for the Mississippi Valley Monday.

The general reaction to higher temperatures has set in over the middle Atlantic states, the Ohio and upper Mississippi valleys and the Pacific Northwest. Higher temperatures are again reported from the Gulf states, the Southwest and the plateau region.

The indications are that the influence of the Western disturbance will extend eastward and cause showers and drizzles in the Mississippi and Ohio valleys, the northern lake region, New England and the northern lake region during the day of the 5th. Fair weather will continue Sunday and Monday in the Atlantic and fair weather is indicated for the Mississippi Valley Monday.

The general reaction to higher temperatures has set in over the middle Atlantic states, the Ohio and upper Mississippi valleys and the Pacific Northwest. Higher temperatures are again reported from the Gulf states, the Southwest and the plateau region.

The indications are that the influence of the Western disturbance will extend eastward and cause showers and drizzles in the Mississippi and Ohio valleys, the northern lake region, New England and the northern lake region during the day of the 5th. Fair weather will continue Sunday and Monday in the Atlantic and fair weather is indicated for the Mississippi Valley Monday.

The general reaction to higher temperatures has set in over the middle Atlantic states, the Ohio and upper Mississippi valleys and the Pacific Northwest. Higher temperatures are again reported from the Gulf states, the Southwest and the plateau region.

The indications are that the influence of the Western disturbance will extend eastward and cause showers and drizzles in the Mississippi and Ohio valleys, the northern lake region, New England and the northern lake region during the day of the 5th. Fair weather will continue Sunday and Monday in the Atlantic and fair weather is indicated for the Mississippi Valley Monday.

The general reaction to higher temperatures has set in over the middle Atlantic states, the Ohio and upper Mississippi valleys and the Pacific Northwest. Higher temperatures are again reported from the Gulf states, the Southwest and the plateau region.

THE DRAMA.

"The Summer Widowers" at the Broadway Theatre.

Low Fields presented at the Broadway Theatre last night his latest hot weather "review," "The Summer Widowers," in which he played the principal comedy part. The piece is by Glen MacDonough, with music by A. Baldwin Stone.

The play is meant in plot, as offerings of this sort usually are, but it contains several good songs, is well acted and is staged elaborately. Several specialty acts are introduced to enliven the play, and electrical devices are utilized to hold the attention.