

TRADE UNION POLITICS

The Osborne Decision—A Salaried Parliament.

Conservatism, ingrained in English institutions and character, has an unmistakable trend toward radicalism. In recent letters I have shown that legislation for railways has involved from the outset safeguards for public rights and an effective system of state control on more advanced lines than those followed in the new American law.

The trade unions through close construction of their charter are temporarily thrown out of politics. They will not stay out. Their leaders, with the rank and file behind them, are determined to remain in Parliament and to obtain full restoration of their resources of political organization.

At the approaching sessions of the Labor Conference and of the Trade Union Congress there will be belligerent speeches and uncompromising resolutions and cumulative pressure will be brought to bear upon the Liberal government to provide adequate redress for the grievances of the working world.

Two remedies are proposed for the Osborne decision. One is the enactment of a bill removing all existing disabilities of trade unions and enabling them to raise money for political purposes without reference to the restrictions of the original charter.

There are no indications at present of government preference for one or the other policy. There is, however, a general admission on the part of ministers that the Osborne decision has created an impossible situation and that something will have to be done to alter it.
