PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY

Its First Concert This Season with Mme. Carreno.

The Philharmonic Society began its twenty-second season in Carnegie Hall last night, and the music which it played will be repeated in the same room this afternoon. There was nothing in the performance to indicate the age of the organization unless it was the programme, which lacked even the suggestion of novelty.

A similar remark might be made of the solo feature if long admiration for Mme. Carreno, a deep sense of gratitude for pleasure given in the past and again awakened last night, and a proper sense of gallantry did not prevent. Art like hers does not grow old, and its charm is only enhanced by retrospect and the wonder compelled by its perennial freshness.

She played Tschalkowsky's concerto in B-flat minor with great brilliancy and carried her hearers with her as completely as she used to do an earlier generation of concertgoers. The list of pieces was divided between the Russian composer and Berlioz, the co-contractor preceded by the overture to "King Lear" and the "Fantastic Symphony" and followed by Tschalkowsky's "Marche Slave," compounded of a Servian folk tune and the melody of the Russian national hymn.

Some changes have been made in the personnel of the orchestra and also in the disposition of the players. There is a new concertmaster in the person of Mr. Leopold Krámer, once a leader of the strings under Theodore Thomas in Chicago, and afterward the principal of the Chicago Opera Company. Mr. Stankovský has divided his brass instruments so that trumpets, trombones and tubas now flank the strings on one side and the horns on the other.

Whether or not these changes have had a material effect on the quality and balance of the band's tone could not be said after a first hearing, but it is to be noted that the music had a fine homogeneity last night and the euphony was admirable.

READER PRESENTS DRAMA

Produces "Michael and His Lost Angel" in Original Form.

Mrs. Harriet Labadie gave the first of a series of three dramatic readings last night at the Berkeley Theatre, when she interpreted Henry Arthur Jones's play in five acts, "Michael and His Lost Angel." Although the drama, which treats of the conflict between love and religion, was acted at the Empire Theatre in 1888, the version given there was one revised by order of the English dramatic censor.

Mrs. Labadie's reading presented the play for the first time in its original form. Her interpretation served to contrast the ethical problems of the drama by differentiation of character through voice and expression. Mme. Labadie, at her second reading, to be held at the Berkeley Theatre, will present Eugene Brieux's comedy, "The Three Daughters of Monsieur Dupont," acted in this country by Laurence Irving.
