

The New Campaign

ANTWERP AND ITS INFLUENCE—AMERICAN OPINIONS—ENGLISH OPINIONS—THE INDIAN TROOPS—THE GERMAN STAFF—THE FRENCH STAFF—WHY IT FAILED AT FIRST—THE COMING ZEPPELINS.

(Copyright, 1914, by George W. Simeley.)

London, October 13. Much further to the north than the French staff had expected. But if Namur and the Meuse-Sambre basin are to be held, it is not the public opinion which is the main thing to be considered. It is not the public opinion which is the main thing to be considered. It is not the public opinion which is the main thing to be considered.

A German Antwerp. Of Antwerp as a naval base it will be time enough to speak when it becomes possible, should it ever become possible, for the Germans to use a naval base. Submarines might possibly find their way there through the Dutch canals. If they did, there would still be between them and the sea the narrow Scheldt river, which is a craft through the Scheldt would be like the use of the canals, a violation of Dutch neutrality.

The Germans, we all know, care nothing for neutrality, nothing for treaties, nothing for the Geneva Convention, nothing for a party, and nothing for the rights of any State which stands in their way. But it is probable that, for the moment, this neutrality of Holland is of greater value to Germany than the Scheldt as a naval highway can be. Rotterdam is for certain purposes a German port; a port of entry for neutral vessels with cargoes intended ultimately for Germany. What the German papers tell us is that Antwerp is to be a base for Zepplins first and then for a fleet for the invasion of England. The latter is remote. The Zepplin matter is best disposed of by the German papers tell us that Antwerp will be a base for Zepplins first and then for a fleet for the invasion of England.

The Coming Zepplins. The English made no secret of their belief that sooner or later—and probably sooner—the Germans will dispatch Zepplins to England, and that they will consist of bombs. Of the military and naval schemes of defence against this particular kind of brigandage it would be wrong to speak though probably the Germans know more about it than we do. It is rather known that the German staff has decided to have given their most particular attention. It is the belief of the Home Secretary, in whose jurisdiction this business belongs, that the spies have been rooted out and that from this source there is no longer any danger. I cannot hear of anybody else who shares with Mr. McKenna this comfortable illusion.

London, which is to be the main target for German bombs, practice, shows a little concern. The Londoner is rather disposed to grumble at the little inconveniences to which defensive measures subject him than to avert or the danger of the bomb. It is two or three weeks since the streets were darkened. The authorities press the point more and more and almost day by day. They submit of course they have no choice but to do so. There are more accidents. The streets are less safe to the pedestrian. The pickpocket and the East End rough have a better field for their various industries. Shopkeepers, save their soubot windows, are obliged to put out their own headlights, and you set out to Shepley when you go. All these annoyances have their use. The terror which the Germans hope to inspire is forgotten.

Miss Nora McAdoo, eldest daughter of the Secretary of the Treasury, went to Baltimore to-day to visit Mr. and Mrs. Robert Garrett, who later in the day left that city in their private car to attend the Yale-Princeton football game. They will be accompanied by Mrs. Bayard and Miss McAdoo and others will form the house party to be entertained by Mr. and Mrs. Garrett at their Princeton residence over Sunday.

NOTED VIOLINIST AND NEW PIANIST HEARD

Two Concerts Provide a Saturday Afternoon's Musical Entertainment.

Yesterday's concert, falling together in the afternoon, were a recital of violin music by Elena Zimbalist at Carnegie Hall and a recital of piano music by Vida Liewellyn at Aeolian Hall. Mrs. Zimbalist had not only been heard here before this season, but has established a place which she alone can retain in the ranks of artists of her kind. He did nothing toward such a disturbance yesterday, even if he did nothing to fortify his position. He did duty toward the classics which is become conventional by playing a sonata by Handel in the style which the music of that master demands, and Rach's Chaconne with the clarity of utterance (including purity of intonation) which is obligatory upon virtuosity of his style, but with much less breadth of manner than the music asks. Besides, he played many small things, transcriptions, as the fashion of the day seems to demand, and a show piece—Wieniawsky's fantasia on melodies from "Faust"—to display his technical skill, which has been sufficiently praised. Numerous hearers enjoyed all that he did without reflecting upon their artistic judgment.
