Worried About Republicans.

The greatest source of worry to House Democrats is the stand which will be taken by the majority of the Republicans. While many are convinced of the President's course, Democratic members say, there is a general feeling that most of them will vote to protect the lives of American citizens, wherever they may be.

Wilson Might Put It Through.

There are some Senators who do not believe such a resolution could muster a majority even if the President did come out in favor of it, but at present about half the Democratic Senators are in favor of it, while all but one of the Republicans are opposed to it. With the support of the President, enough Democratic Senators might be swung in line to permit its passage.

Wilson Might Put It Through.

On this attitude of the President there is considerable speculation. Outwardly he is showing no weakening in his present position. At the White House and State Department to-day the impression was that another "calm" was at hand, that Germany's stand that she would begin the torpedoing of armed merchantmen on March 1 was irrevocable, no matter what this country might do, while the President was determined not to yield any further.

Wilson Might Put It Through.

But the fact that both Stone and Flood, two of the three who had conferred secretly with the President Monday night, suddenly came out to-day in favor of a resolution warning Americans off armed liners created much wonder in Congressional circles.

Wilson Might Put It Through.

Both decried the position of the President and asserted their opposition to it, but it was remarked that acidum in the past had either differed with the President on any important question.

Wilson Might Put It Through.

This attitude on their part indicated that some Republicans had a day or two ago been persuaded by the President to some extent. They recalled that about a week ago a high official of the State Department admitted the question of asking Congress to pass such a resolution, as a way out, was being seriously considered.

Wilson Might Put It Through.

Contradiction Follows. This was accepted as final until the meeting of the Cabinet a day or two later, when it was announced that the Administration had no intention of surrendering the rights of Americans to travel on merchantmen armed for defense, and that the Administration never had considered any such course.

Wilson Might Put It Through.

With this flat contradiction in mind, Republicans were not so sure to-day that the President would be displeased if a resolution such as is being considered were passed by Congress.

Wilson Might Put It Through.

Republican leaders in the Senate declared they would welcome an attempt on the part of the Democrats to put through such a resolution. They said it would expose to the country the weak and timid foreign policy of the administration. In the House, the Republicans were less inclined to take this view, largely because the ranking Republican member of the House Foreign Affairs Committee, Cooper, of Wisconsin, is heartily in favor of the resolution.

Wilson Might Put It Through.

In State Department circles it was said the President must decide whether the Lusitania case is to be kept to the front or is to be sidetracked while Secretary Lansing and Ambassador von Bernstorff debate the nice distinctions between offensive and defensive armament. It is possible the President will take a firm stand and insist on a prompt recognition of his repeated demands, but official Washington is not yet convinced that such is his determination.

Wilson Might Put It Through.

Germany's Game. Germany's game is delay and debate. Count von Bernstorff expects within a day or two instructions from his government as to the line of argument he is to pursue. If it fulfills his expectations it will have little to do with the Lusitania. The destruction of 11 American lives more than nine months ago has dropped out of sight as an issue between the United States and Germany. The United States is now asked to define the conditions on which it will acquiesce in Germany's submarine campaign.

Wilson Might Put It Through.

Many administration officials are frankly in favor of waiting for a case to arise before prosecuting the matter further. The destruction of an armed merchantman, they argue, would put the question in concrete form. It is generally agreed here that the President's acknowledged passion for "calm counsel" will place him quickly in the hands of the German Ambassador. If he consents to debate the army of merchantmen with Germany it is believed that all hope of settlement for the Lusitania case on terms honorable to this government will be lost.

Wilson Might Put It Through.

The United States has taken the position in the Lusitania case that its honor was touched by the torpedoing of the vessel. It has repeatedly refused to submit any part of the question to arbitration. Nations agree that arbitration cannot be resorted to in cases involving national honor. This has generally agreed also that such a question is not subject to debate. The President consents to disagree into the byways of legal and technical questions there is no hope that the Lusitania case will be further delayed. When he insisted recently that Germany should come to terms without further delay the same officials were ready to believe that they fear now that he will not do so, but will take the position that new considerations, requiring further "calm counsel," have entered into the question.
