Winnecke's Comet Is Sighted; To Be Nearest Earth in June

CAMBRIDGE, Mass., April 12.—Winnecke's comet, which approaches the earth every five years and eight months and will come "very near" the earth in June, according to the prediction of Dr. Cromelin, the English astronomer, has been sighted by Professor E. E. Barnard, of the Yerkes Observatory at Williams Bay, Wis. Word to this effect was received at the Harvard Observatory today.

Winnecke's Comet Is Sighted; To Be Nearest Earth in June

The orbit of Reid's comet has been computed by Messrs. Einarsson and Meyer, the student assistants at the University of California, says Dr. Leuschner, of the University of California. It will be four and one-half times brighter than when it was discovered, and on April 28 about seven and one-half times brighter.

Winnecke's Comet Is Sighted; To Be Nearest Earth in June

If Reid's comet keeps on increasing in brightness at its present rate the Harvard astronomers predict that it will be visible to the naked eye. The comet is at the present situated just to the east of the star Gamma in the constellation Cygnus.

Reid's comet, which was discovered at Cape Town, South Africa, on March 18, and is now steadily increasing in brightness, will make its nearest approach to the sun on May 10, according to word received at Harvard from Dr. Leuschner, of the University of California.
