Early, 1859.
What a bliss! do you not call?
Lullaby in my bed!
Lullaby in my bed!

SPECTRE

OF INGLETON; OR THE FOREST MYSTERY.

By Christine B. Carpenter.

She passed in embarrassment as she encountered his eyes, which were fixed upon her face in searching earnestness.
'Is there something so formidable in mentioning me that you thus pause?'
She blushed deeply, but did not reply, and then archly exclaimed, a smile dimpling her mouth, at his misanthropic her hesitancy:

Mr. 'Twas a beautiful scene—a holy one—those two young beings, both strong in moral goodness.
Harry, with his dark hair's glossy curls lifted as if by a breeze, his attitude as devout as if pleading with an angel—Virginia in her fairy robe, her beautiful head tilted aside in maiden modesty, one hand laid in the other's, the other resting on his shoulder, the young man, nature's true nobleman, asking the love of his first affection.
Virginia had drooped lower, as she murmured 'I could!' as low that none but a lover's ear could have heard it.
'God bless you for the answer!' he exclaimed, as he wound his arm around her unresisting form, and drawing her face to his shoulder, pressed his lips to her rosy mouth.
For a long time they stood still, their souls holding communion, hearts beating in unison, while the guardian angels dipping their wings in holy light, rested lightly upon their bosoms, and soared upward to God, shouting a glorious anthem, for the true beings still on earth.
At length Harry was startled from his waking dream by feeling the fingers clasped in his, shiver in his warm grasp.
'Dearer, you are cold, I am cruel, thoughtless, to expose you to this night air.' He released the hand he had so long held, and hastened to restore it to her, and now for the first time she thought of Edward; but on looking round, no sign of him presented themselves; a sudden fear crossed her mind, which she imparted to Harry, but he greeted her doubts, saying it was more than likely he had returned home, and Virginia happy in her new love, forgot her fears.
On reaching Rose Villa, Virginia insisted that Harry should remain, and after leaving him in the drawing room, she went to seek her parents.
Some time previous to this, the latter had begun to grow uneasy concerning their children, as it had grown dark, and they had not returned, and they knew not which way they had gone. Mr. Remson was about setting forth to find some traces of them, when Edward entered with a mischievous smile curling his mouth, his mother started upon seeing him come, and hurriedly exclaimed, 'Where is Virginia?'
'In good company he assured, mother dear,' replied he. 'I left her down by the brook, in conversation with Mr. Harry Cranfield, you have heard so much of the will be here soon. They appeared to be earnestly engaged, so I thought I would steal off without disturbing them.' He then related the occurrence of the afternoon, and concluded by exclaiming:
'I hear their voices now! For their selfishness, they deserve to think I am lost,' and he hid in a small closet in the room.
By this time, Virginia entered. 'Oh Edward here,' she asked.
Aunt answered Mrs. Remson's face, she answered, 'Why my dear what has detained you so long, and why do you ask if Edward is here. I heard you talking with some one, as you entered the hall, is he not with you?'
'I was talking with a friend, Mr. Cranfield, whom I left in the parlor, but is Edward not here? He did not return with me, I concluded he was home.' And her tone began to assume a shade of alarm, when a voice from the closet exclaimed: 'How terribly thoughtful of the maid, the boy emerged from his hiding place, and immediately after all adjourned to the drawing room, where her parents received Harry with welcome cordiality.
The latter bore the impress of a true gentleman upon his face, and Mr. and Mrs. Remson, if they had any fears respecting their daughter's companion, were speedily as much prepossessed in his favor, as he had been. After receiving their hearty congratulations as to his escape, Harry in a subsequent conversation, mentioned Colonel Peeling.
'Peeling,' said Mr. Remson, I have heard the name before, but I do not know when or where.'
In the excitement and succeeding incidents of the afternoon, Harry had entirely forgotten the note which called him to Green brook, until Mr. Remson mentioned a circumstance, which brought it back to his mind; drawing it from his memorandum, he handed it to the other, and as he did so he thought the latter, could have had any connection with the incident upon his life. 'We do not know, whether it was premeditated,' replied he, 'or he had perceived it, that this seems to confirm my suspicions, that it was a surprise for you.' As I live, I believe it was all a plot, to ensure you there and murder you!'
'Yes, to murder me!' said Harry, with something of a shudder, at the recollection of his escape. 'I suppose Mr. Remson, you are aware of the tragedy enacted here, not long since?'
'The assassination of your brother,' 'Twas a sad affair—ah, sir, you have narrowly escaped, did you catch a glimpse of the face of the villain?'
'No, neither of him, nor my mysterious presences as they were in a position which precluded that possibility.'
'Who could have been the strange rescuer? His very singular!'
