

CROWDING TO BOTH OPERS.

A FIRST NIGHT CALCULATED TO TICKLE THE RIVAL MANAGERS.

The Old Patrons Nix to Mapleson and Irving Place—The Vanderbilts Take Leave of the Palace on Broadway—Mr. Abbey's Precursors He is Quite Satisfied.

A dozen speculators with nickel badges, and bank bills twined in their fingers, took their stations at the main entrance of the new opera house as early as six o'clock.

The crowd on Seventh avenue flattened their noses against the windows looking in under the stage, and the people in Thirty-ninth street wedged themselves about the stage door.

The number of people who claimed acquaintance with Mr. Abbey's new opera house, astonished both those gentlemen. They expressed their pleasure at meeting these new found friends.

The great majority of the people entered the Opera House by the Broadway entrance. The crowd on Broadway was so dense that it was necessary to have a special force of police to keep it from overflowing.

The grand staircase ran up on the right side of the house. The lobby on the first floor was heavily filled. Over the lobby on the first floor was a large and beautiful chandelier.

As each box on the four tiers has its separate entrance from the corridors, it was easy to find the seat. The ladies in the boxes were dressed in the most elegant and costly costumes.

At ten minutes before 8 there was a line of people extending from the box office of the family circle of the Academy into Fourteenth street.
