

JUST NOISE IN A NEW PLAY.

"SPOTLESS TOWN" IS AN END-OF-THE-SEASON FREAK.

An imitation Weberfeld Due in it and many girls of all sizes, including one who would outshout Maggie Cline—supposed to portray New York.

"Spotless Town" is at the Fourteenth Street Theatre—any one living within a radius of a half mile will be aware of the fact last night. As a dramatization of a soap opera, it is a dandruff cure—it is hardly a success, but as the artistic expression of the personal psychology of a cannibal band it is a roaring triumph. Incidentally it is noiser than the circus.

The author, who wears the poetic name of Whitcomb Riley, has dumped into his piece almost everything that has happened in New York from the Two Dromios to Weber & Fields. All the sizes, including one who would outshout Maggie Cline, are in this show town, where the inhabitants seem to be shouting "fish" up a dark alley or else chasing pistol whiffers and tall girls, and girls and small, and girls that change their names every few minutes, the interludes being played by the German band of Carl and Brown—two devoted students of Weberfeldism. The singing is terrific, there is no other way of putting the case. A lady who emulates the "Spotless Town" and danced a hornpipe with her larynx. So that no one in the audience would be sensibly disposed, but the "Spotless Town" and the "Yankee" were trotted out and indulged in a mass. And not an egg materialized.

The specks, two delicate lilipluminae—two faces—went through familiar tricks including a prize "mill." The music was a "Spotless Town" in an oblique way, entering the scene by the way of a worn away. The audience laughed and a poor lady upstairs cried during the performance—a critic in embryo. The dramatic season is at hand. "Spotless Town" is an unusually distorted version of the usual. And please ask no one what it is all about.

A week later, "A Chinese Honeycomb" will be the remarkable run at the Casino. "The Prince of Pilsen" is a lively show at the Broadway, and there is no sign of the peering making for another. The one and only performance of "The Wizard" (or is to take place on April 15, and success will be given away. The Academy of Music has a winner in "The Suburban." The Weber & Fields new Broadway show, "The West End," has "The Fatal Wedding" this week. The fifteenth century morality play "Everyman" is doing well at the Grand Opera House. "The Sultan of Sulu," is still turning people away at Wallack's. Charles Hawtree, the English actor, is appearing in former success at the Criterion. "A Message from Mars," Augustus Thomas's comedy, "The Earl of Pawtucket," is playing to the capacity of the Manhattan at every performance. Wants to Smash a Polygamist With Her Little Hatchet, but Doesn't Find One.

SALT LAKE, Utah, April 6.—Mrs. Carrie Nation invaded the Mormon Tabernacle to-day and asked permission of President Smith to address the 12,000 Mormons in attendance. "Have they started that story?" she queried, as she pulled a hatchet from beneath the folds of her dress. "I got my first view of a Mormon to-day. They look all right, but I want to see a Mormon, an attorney, show me one I will brand him with my hatchet. Polygamist and whiskey drinking are twin evils—both wreck homes. I have smashed barrels of whiskey, and now I could tackle a polygamist with pleasure. What does a man want with more than one wife? My husband thought one was enough. He divorced me, you know."
