EAST SIDE HOUSE CELEBRATES.

An Unveiling of a Fountain and a June Walk in the Park.

Mrs. A. R. Bradford of Lenox, Mass., gave to the East Side Settlement House at Seventy-sixth street and the East River $500 that they might build a fountain in memory of her only son, who died on his twenty-first birthday.

The fountain, which is in the wall facing the sidewalk and which was designed and constructed by boys of the settlement house, was unveiled.

James S. Cushman, president of the settlement, presented the fountain, and Miss M. de G. Trenholm, head worker, accepted it, then ten-year-old Helen Brett recited a bit of Bohemian verse about the beauty of water and the old country myths of its healing effects, and Arthur J. Dickler sang.

The ceremony was presided over by Timothy Cune, aged 4, who pulled the flag down upon himself on the actual unveiling while 500 children sang "America."

But the unveiling business of the morning sank into insignificance beside the sport of the afternoon. The "June walk" took place yesterday, and it is from the June walk that the Bohemians of the upper East Side date the events of the year.

Some 1,000 strong, they met at the house and marched to the Seventy-second street car to Central Park.

The workers connected with the house were distracted at first with the frequent set-backs among the boys, and they spent much of their time Gov. Gillette through the crowd, but their efforts were of little avail.

All of which didn't worry Miss Trenholm a bit. "We want them to grow up sturdy and manly, and this rough and tumble sort of training they get for that end."

RITUALIST CHURCH MAY MOVE. Harlan Body Anxious to Go to Washington or University Heights.

The vestry of the Church of the Redeemer, now in Harlan, has voted to sell the property, move to another place and try again.

It was in the Church of the Redeemer, New York, that ritualism had its most prolific growth in the '30s, when its development threw Episcopalians and a good many others into religious hysterics.

The Church of the Redeemer was at that time in Park avenue at Eighty-second street, but the parish failed for lack of income, and its removal followed.

It was a little more than ten years ago that the Redeemer absorbed the Church of the Holy Nativity in 18th street near Seventh avenue.

Now it is announced that changes in population in Harlan make it impossible for the church to get on longer.
