

BOSTON ARTISTS' WORK HERE IS UNIMPRESSIVE

Conventional Little Group of Paintings at MacDowell Club Gallery.

NOT THAT THEY'RE LOCAL: Olaf M. Brauner With a Portrait Nearest to Exhibiting Distinction.

With the advancing days of autumn the galleries along Fifth avenue or nearby streets will exhibit an occasional art exhibition to give him pause.

The MacDowell Club has ready its third group exhibition, which the public may inspect without fee or hindrance at the club's gallery, 108 West Fifty-fifth street.

Of the Water Color Club and the Bosto-lazzi drawings there will be time to speak later on let it be supposed meantime that the visitor has first of all entered the MacDowell Club's well proportioned room and is about to see what is to be offered.

When Boston work, whether in the graphic arts or in music, is presented to the view of hearing New Yorkers, there is perhaps a tendency here to look at it too much as a homogeneous whole.

So it will be accurate as well as generous to admit that this MacDowell Club show need not be called a display of traits peculiarly Bostonian, because it is in all things quite un-Bostonian.

Mother Superior Killed Rescuing Baby at Orphanage Fire. SAN ANTONIO, Tex., Oct. 30.—After rescuing from a fire eighty-five children six Sisters of Charity gave up their lives to-day in flames that destroyed St. John's Orphanage. Only two of their little charges were lost.

The fire started early in the morning. Roused from their sleep, the nuns marshaled their wards to fire escapes, remaining at their posts until flames barred the way to safety.

ENGINEERS' AWARD READY.

Findings Will Not Be Made Public for Some Time. At the close of yesterday's session of the arbitration committee of seven on the demands of the engineers on the Eastern railroads it was announced by Chairman Van Hise that the committee would probably finish its present hearings by the end of this week.

It will then have passed on the rough draft of the award, but it is not to be made public until it has been verified by the statisticians of the committee.

"While the election has nothing to do with the matter," Mr. Van Hise continued, "the election will be long over before we will be able to make our award public. It will be accompanied by a report explaining all the points at issue and giving in detail the reasons for the award."

TWO SINGERS APPEAR.

One Sings With Good Voice and Taste, the Other Without. It took two people to give a song recital at the Carnegie Lyceum last evening and it was not a very good one at that. A soprano and a barytone were the two who sang songs of song after song. At last Charles Gilbert Spross was at the piano. He, at any rate, showed both endurance and courage. These two singers were Elsa Staiger and Carl Schlegel. It seems hardly necessary to specify which was the soprano and which the barytone, but it is important to say that one was a singer and the other was not.

Mr. Schlegel is not familiar to the local concert platform, but without doubt he will be heard again on occasion. He has a voice of exceptional natural beauty and his tone production last night was such as to give pleasure to lovers of normal, unaffected singing. With a free, uncontrolled voice, he sang with a certain quality of tone, dynamic and smooth, and steadily made the purely superficial qualities of this singing were certainly pleasing. It can also be said that while there was no great warmth in the music there was great wit and a certain amount of humor that struck an audience to much enthusiasm he would at any time interest and please hearers.

Miss Staiger is the possessor of one of those thin, high, penetrating soprano voices which can be made satisfying only by the direction of fine musical intelligence. The singer sharpened the acidity of her tones by bad production. Her attack was especially vicious and her tones were generally obscured by an audible strident note. The young woman may possibly become a good singer some day, but in the present stage of her artistic development she is entirely unfitted for public appearance.

JOHN T. MEEHAN'S FUNERAL.

Well Known Men Pay Respect to Memory of Owner of Dolan's. The funeral of John T. Meehan, known to most of downtown New York as the proprietor of Dolan's beer and restaurant in Park Row, was held yesterday morning. The service was read at Mr. Meehan's home, 1840 Grand Concourse, The Bronx. Following the service, the Rev. Father John Roche officiated at a high requiem mass in the Church of the Holy Spirit at Aqueduct and Burnside avenues. The burial was in Calvary Cemetery.

In his sermon Father Roche spoke of Mr. Meehan as a man who remained simple in his life and tastes and without arrogance in spite of large wealth. Hundreds of friends of Meehan attended the funeral. Among them were Sheriff Harbort, Thomas F. McAvoy, Brian G. Hughes, Arthur Murphy, State Fire Marshal Thomas J. Conroy, C. W. Cowan, William J. Pelton and ex-Congressman Joseph A. Gouldin. The honorary pallbearers were Albert J. Brennan, John F. Walsh, George W. Weeks, Jerome F. Healy, Police Capt. Dennis J. Brennan, John F. McAvoy and James Brennan.

The oldest customer and the oldest employee of the restaurant were at the funeral. The former was John McAvoy, a Port Orleans employee, who has lunched at Dolan's for thirty-three years. Adam Brennan, known to customers of the restaurant as "Binkie," was the oldest employee. He has worked there for thirty-eight years.

There were about a hundred and fifty floral pieces. Big Six Typographical Union, whose membership includes the Port Orleans employees, and the Exempt Firemen of the Bronx, were among the senders of these pieces. The procession, which was led by a band of mounted police from the Highbridge station.

MRS. YOUNG TELLS WHAT ISN'T REWRITING A PLAY

Testifies in Mrs. Furness's Suit for $10,000 Royalties of "The Lottery Man."

FIGHTS CLAIM FOR SHARE

Declares Investing Sum in New Idea in Plot Is Only Padding.

Mrs. Rida Johnson Young, playwright and authoress, told a jury before Supreme Court Justice Hotchkiss yesterday how to write plays that will be successful. She is testifying for the defence in a suit brought by Mrs. Edith Ellis Furness, also a playwright, against Lee Shubert and Charles Young to recover $10,000 of the royalties from Mrs. Young's "The Lottery Man."

"I claim that Mrs. Furness did no re-writing of this play," testified Mrs. Young, darting a glance at Mrs. Furness. "She only did such work on the play as comes within the scope of duty of the stage producer."

"Well, if I should show you eight entire pages inserted in that play by Mrs. Furness would you still say she did no re-writing of 'The Lottery Man'?" asked the plaintiff's attorney.

"I should say Mrs. Furness simply copied what I brought in," replied Mrs. Young. "Well, bringing out points in the play more emphatically; isn't that play writing?"

"No, that is stage directing." "Well, inserting a scene or changing a plot; isn't that play writing?" "It would be, as an author, did it," replied Mrs. Young.

"Wouldn't it be play writing if Mrs. Furness did it to your play?" "No, I would call that padding."

The lawyer who represented Mrs. Furness didn't raise a question about the legality of a lottery in which a man would offer himself as a matrimonial prize to women. "I admit that Mrs. Furness was a stage producer," Mrs. Young said, "but it wasn't Mrs. Furness who raised the point. But I think the way I wrote it was just as logical as the change made in the original. The only difference is this: The lottery is excused because the man says that while it is against the law to give a prize away in a lottery, it is not against the law to give the prize to give itself away, as in 'The Lottery Man.' It was not very sensible, but it was just an excuse to give an over-enthusiastic press, so that it would appear to be logical."

The jurors were provided yesterday with copies of Mrs. Young's original manuscript and the copy of the play as changed by Mrs. Furness and the produced. The trial will continue to-day.
