

"TIEFLAND" GIVEN AT CENTURY OPERA

Eugen d'Albert's Opera Revived After Rest of Six Years.

WORK IS FAIRLY SUNG Want of Large Melodic Expression Chief Drawback to Popularity.

Eugen d'Albert's opera "Tiefland" was produced at the Century Opera House last evening. The work was first heard in this city at the Metropolitan Opera House on November 23, 1908, under the joint management of Giulio Gatti-Casazza and Andreas Dippel.

The plot is perhaps not as well known as present-day operas, as those of a few years ago, when memories of it may be fresher. But it may be recalled that the action hinges on the illicit love of Sebastian for his handmaiden, who has been compelled to his will and whom he drives into a marriage to Pedro to cloak his iniquity.

The production at the Century last evening had most of the merits and defects of the productions which had preceded it. There was the same regrettable failure to attain the chief aim of the institution, namely, a demonstration that English text is not so difficult to sing as is usually supposed.
