

MAN WHO MAY SPLIT THE BULL MOOSE PARTY

Character Sketch of Senator Harvey D. Hinman, Republican Candidate for Nomination for Governor of New York—His O. K. by Roosevelt May Result in Dissensions in Third Party

Senator Harvey D. Hinman

THE political wheel of fortune has turned. After four years of comparative seclusion, speaking in a party sense, Harvey D. Hinman rises to a new born prominence. Thanks to the endorsement of Col. Roosevelt and the Moose's need for a man supposedly capable of leading the Progressive cohorts in the forthcoming gubernatorial contest, why has Hinman been chosen for the fight?

A couple of years ago Hinman was chosen for the United Mine Workers, against whom suit had been brought. Col. Roosevelt's testimony was called for in the case and was taken in his office in the editorial rooms of the Outlook. With that immediate matter disposed of, Hinman and the Colonel quite naturally chatted upon things political.

Mr. Hinman stated his views with characteristic clearness, and upon the whole showed that he and the Colonel were quite of one mind upon a number of important topics. In short, the great Bull Moose was very much pleased with the gentleman from Binghamton, and he has picked Mr. Hinman as the man most likely to draw to the Progressive ranks the discontented of the rival party. But this is not enough in the way of a picture for the public to evaluate the Colonel's choice.

Down in the southern tier very strange views are held regarding Harvey D. Hinman. All of these views are not readily put in an index of the man's opinions are pronounced, whether they are for or against him. Born in a hamlet on the Onondaga bearing the name of Pitcher, Hinman turned his talents to the legal profession in the course of time and in due season established himself in Binghamton. Of his legal ability there is substantially but no opinion, and that unquestionably a frequent one. As a native of Broome county recently put it: "If you're cleared of being hung on the evidence," you'd better get Hinman for your counsel." The "Pride of Pitcher" is undoubtedly one of the shrewdest lawyers in the State of New York and in his home State is ranked without a rival.

Back in 1894 Hinman was given a break for his talents through the influence of George W. Dunn, Tom Platt's old lieutenant. Dunn put Hinman up for election and saw to it that he got to Albany. People familiar with the Senate of those days can easily recall the arrival of Harvey Hinman.

Nature cut him out to be conspicuous in a physical sense at least. Quite six feet tall, he seems to tower higher because of the lanky get up of his body. He is as thin as a rail and his clothes almost hang upon his gaunt frame. His black garb emphasizes his utter slenderness and his scowling scowl, but lengthens the angularity and deepens the lines of his heavily marked face. His friends are pleased to liken his appearance to that of Lincoln.

The Colonel's choice chews tobacco and he has a way of pursing his mouth and shifting his quid deliberately before speaking. Then up goes the chin with an aggressive toss and out are shot the few short sentences that hold the much or the little that Hinman chooses to convey. Possibly the significance of the words may not be apparent for some time to come, for the "Pride of Pitcher" has a cryptic way of talking that is strikingly individual.

Born on a farm and reared there, Senator Hinman's language savors of the soil, and his smiles are characteristically rural in match of their homely force. He has a great many pet expressions of a singular bucolic tinge and what might be called a measure of picturesque profanity at command. But don't be misled; Harvey Hinman is anything but loquacious. Indeed, he is prone to talk only little, and at times his reticence amounts almost to taciturnity. People who have seen much of him for years say that Hinman never answers a question, but no one can say that he has seen Hinman dodge. The fact is his mind moves too quickly and cleverly for that.

It would be hard to imagine Senator Hinman to be a New Yorker, because his strong nasal swang gives him the true stamp of the New Englander from "Way Down East." But it is not because his voice is an unpleasant one that Harvey Hinman has found it wiser to hold it in check. Silence or stinky sentences, so his critics say, have helped to cloak the workings of a fairly remarkable mind.

Certain it is that his voice was seldom heard upon the floor during his first term in Albany. He talked little, but never failed to insist that his voice should be made a matter of record. He had an object in that; he was seeing to it that his political opponents should not be able to come back at him with charges in the matter of legislative attitudes that he could not gain say. He was not a keen lawyer for nothing; he had a purpose in looking to the records to which he was a party.

Most people can recall the turmoil in the Legislature when the 80 cent gas bill was under discussion. There was no question about the popular demand for the passage of that measure, and the legislative body was very closely divided upon the bill. Harvey Hinman voted against it, and when rising to explain his vote said that he had been guided by some one whom he trusted like a father. The "some one" had told him that the measure was a strike bill. George W. Dunn was the particular "father" in the case.

In the spring of 1906, after the insurance investigation, Charles E. Hughes took his bills to Albany. At that time Higgins was Governor of the State. It is common knowledge that the Hughes bills were generally unwelcome in certain powerful quarters in the Legislature, and they had pretty rough going, but public opinion was back of them and most of the prominent newspapers favored their passage. They probably would have gone through, but the unexpected happened.

About 1908 the Republican machine in the State was rapidly going to pieces. It was a political crisis of a heart-breaking sort for the G. O. P. Somehow Harvey Hinman did not measure up to the standards imposed by those in power and he was not put on the State ticket, as he had been led to expect.

This was the beginning of his political conversion. Just at that time Mr. Travis of Brooklyn was making himself unwelcome at Albany by reason of a direct primary bill which he persisted in bringing there for consideration. Barnes led the fight against the Travis measure and succeeded in defeating it in the end.

However, Charles E. Hughes, then Governor, believed in Travis's efforts and took the Brooklynite's bill and put it into shape as a workable proposition. The occasion was one for which Hinman had been looking, and he allied himself with the Governor in his fight for direct primaries. Undoubtedly Hinman owed his first real political prominence to the part he played in supporting that measure which bore later the name of the Hinman-Green bill.

Some persons say that Hinman's advocacy of the Hinman-Green bill was based purely on political expediency. He was wise enough to see the trend of
