

BAZAR HUSHED IN KITCHENER TRIBUTE AS MANAGERS WALK

Business and Merry Making Stop for 10 Minutes During Memorial Service.

PRINCE IN COOK'S ROLE GOSSIP OF THE STAGE

The noisy, crowded Bazaar of the Allies hushed its myriad voices for a moment last evening, and the Grand Central Palace became a cathedral in which a service in memory of Lord Kitchener was conducted.

It was just 9 o'clock and all the singing and merrymaking was in full swing when somewhere in a far gallery the British sounded "taps" for the soldier all Britain is mourning.

Then very softly the band played "Land of Hope and Glory" and the singing of "Onward, Christian Soldiers" ended the ceremony, which interrupted the business of the bazaar less than ten minutes.

Yesterday was Kitchener day at the bazaar, but in the afternoon on the second floor it was also dress day for Mrs. Benjamin Guinness, Miss Janet Scudder and Miss Constance Collier.

Among the pretty actresses at the dinner were Mrs. Constance Collier, Mrs. Africa, Miss Betty Collier, Miss Kathryn Butterfield, Miss Janet Travers, Miss Kathleen MacPherson, Mrs. Jack Fairchild and Mrs. R. G. Rendel.

A pretty Australian girl, Miss Marjorie Quinn, daughter of a member of the New South Wales command, had arrived at the bazaar with a Packard six twin automobile to be sold for the Allies.

Antonio E. Delphino, formerly Consul-General of Venezuela in New York city, who came from South America to be a witness for the contestants in the Amos F. Eno will case before Surrogate Colahan and a jury, was compelled to admit on cross-examination yesterday that he wrote a letter after Mr. Eno's death which was not in harmony with his testimony as to Mr. Eno's mental and physical condition the last few months before he died.

Delphino, who for many years was a close friend of Mr. Eno, admitted under questioning by Austen G. Fox, that he saw Mr. Eno the day before he died, and after his death the witness wrote the following letter to a mutual friend: "I saw him only yesterday, when I found him at his best, and to-day he is dead."

The witness testified on direct examination that in the last summer of Mr. Eno's life he had seen him "quite as well as men." "Women have no brains and they should have no rights," he said in earlier years he always spoke highly of women and he testified to the witness once while they were in Paris together: "French women have great ability; they can manage big enterprises quite as well as men."

The witness said that during the last summer at Saratoga Mr. Eno always carried with him a newspaper which contained a clipping of a woman's article in Lillian Russell was a possible candidate for the office of Mayor of New York city. If any of his guests spoke of suffrage Mr. Eno would produce the clipping and say: "See what we're coming to. We're going to have Lillian Russell for Mayor of New York."
