THE WAR IN BURMAH.

THE PROGRESS OF ENGLISH ANNEXATION IN THE EAST.

"The Burmese war," says a Bombay contemporary, "may be said now to be over; it only remains for us to take quiet possession of whatever portions of these territories we desire to annex, and leave the remainder to the British Government."

one market for the great bulk of the raw material required; and it is well known that the mill owners themselves have long been most anxious to remedy the evil.

The experience of the last few years, says the writer, has sufficiently demonstrated, that so long as we are dependent on our own resources for the supply of raw cotton, we must be eternally subjected to such disastrous interruptions of our industry as it should be the chief object of our policy to prevent.

The great evil, first, that the quality and quantity of the cotton crops are influenced by a variety of circumstances beyond the control of the cultivator.

Second, that besides the chances of the seasons, the amount and price of the cotton varies according to various contingencies.

Thirdly, that the productive capacities of the American cotton districts are being by no means developed in a rapid and efficient manner.

Fourthly, that the means of the English, the American, and the European continental countries, in short, the opinion of eminent practical men, is that, unless some new sources of cotton supply are cultivated, there must occur, before many years, an absolute and permanent deficit in amount, which will remain unremedied, and such, at least, the rumor—has been definitely ascertained, to protect Peru. These tactics may possibly be only the result of excessive caution in an aged general; but if they are more than that, they are certainly not to be commended.
