

upon an emergency, for the most part, in the name of the government of the United States.

Peace upon something by these barriers of foreign... The United States has served, not as it ought to have done, as a nation of concord, but as a ground of offence in common.

From the London Weekly Register, (June 23, 1856.) There is no doubt, although it has not yet been officially announced, that the government of the United States...

From the London Economist, June 23, 1856. The Central American question has begun to assume a new phase, and to force itself somewhat painfully upon our attention...

From the Birmingham Journal, June 23, 1856. The two points of chief interest in connection with these negotiations will be, first, the terms in which Mr. Dallas has been directed by his own government to make the notification to our side...

observer, whose position would entitle him to report and restate. The fact of this conduct of the government, under these circumstances, is that which has been called an 'unmasterly inaction.'

From the London Weekly Register, (June 23, 1856.) There is no doubt, although it has not yet been officially announced, that the government of the United States...

From the London Spectator, June 23, 1856. If history did not teach, beyond contradiction, that nations are as subject as individuals to the prejudices that mislead and the passions that blind the judgment, silence would be the only remedy...

From the London Spectator, June 23, 1856. In 1850, when the Clayton-Bulwer treaty was concluded, it was an acknowledgment and an avowal that no latitude was to be given to the Anglo-Saxon race, was on the part of the Americans, chiefly directed towards Mexico...

From the London Spectator, June 23, 1856. The English in the interest of their supremacy in the world, must, more than any other European nation, be attentive to this movement. They seem to have a presentiment that, if they do not move, they will be left behind...

and that on the dimities of Mr. Crampton by the President becoming known here, it would be considered both by the English government and people as an excellent opportunity...

From the London Spectator, June 23, 1856. If history did not teach, beyond contradiction, that nations are as subject as individuals to the prejudices that mislead and the passions that blind the judgment, silence would be the only remedy...

From the London Spectator, June 23, 1856. In 1850, when the Clayton-Bulwer treaty was concluded, it was an acknowledgment and an avowal that no latitude was to be given to the Anglo-Saxon race, was on the part of the Americans, chiefly directed towards Mexico...

From the London Spectator, June 23, 1856. The English in the interest of their supremacy in the world, must, more than any other European nation, be attentive to this movement. They seem to have a presentiment that, if they do not move, they will be left behind...

From the London Spectator, June 23, 1856. The English in the interest of their supremacy in the world, must, more than any other European nation, be attentive to this movement. They seem to have a presentiment that, if they do not move, they will be left behind...

news of Mr. Crampton's dismissal. At the late dates the American government expected that the answer which it was to receive from London would place it in the necessary position...

From the London Spectator, June 23, 1856. If history did not teach, beyond contradiction, that nations are as subject as individuals to the prejudices that mislead and the passions that blind the judgment, silence would be the only remedy...

From the London Spectator, June 23, 1856. In 1850, when the Clayton-Bulwer treaty was concluded, it was an acknowledgment and an avowal that no latitude was to be given to the Anglo-Saxon race, was on the part of the Americans, chiefly directed towards Mexico...

From the London Spectator, June 23, 1856. The English in the interest of their supremacy in the world, must, more than any other European nation, be attentive to this movement. They seem to have a presentiment that, if they do not move, they will be left behind...

From the London Spectator, June 23, 1856. The English in the interest of their supremacy in the world, must, more than any other European nation, be attentive to this movement. They seem to have a presentiment that, if they do not move, they will be left behind...

maintaining the unity of government and by reuniting the population under the same banner.

From the London Spectator, June 23, 1856. If history did not teach, beyond contradiction, that nations are as subject as individuals to the prejudices that mislead and the passions that blind the judgment, silence would be the only remedy...

From the London Spectator, June 23, 1856. In 1850, when the Clayton-Bulwer treaty was concluded, it was an acknowledgment and an avowal that no latitude was to be given to the Anglo-Saxon race, was on the part of the Americans, chiefly directed towards Mexico...

From the London Spectator, June 23, 1856. The English in the interest of their supremacy in the world, must, more than any other European nation, be attentive to this movement. They seem to have a presentiment that, if they do not move, they will be left behind...

From the London Spectator, June 23, 1856. The English in the interest of their supremacy in the world, must, more than any other European nation, be attentive to this movement. They seem to have a presentiment that, if they do not move, they will be left behind...

swelling the amount of the floating debt of the country which has now reached $30,457,000. The increase since Jan. 1, 1856, has been $1,433,000.

From the London Spectator, June 23, 1856. If history did not teach, beyond contradiction, that nations are as subject as individuals to the prejudices that mislead and the passions that blind the judgment, silence would be the only remedy...

From the London Spectator, June 23, 1856. In 1850, when the Clayton-Bulwer treaty was concluded, it was an acknowledgment and an avowal that no latitude was to be given to the Anglo-Saxon race, was on the part of the Americans, chiefly directed towards Mexico...

From the London Spectator, June 23, 1856. The English in the interest of their supremacy in the world, must, more than any other European nation, be attentive to this movement. They seem to have a presentiment that, if they do not move, they will be left behind...

From the London Spectator, June 23, 1856. The English in the interest of their supremacy in the world, must, more than any other European nation, be attentive to this movement. They seem to have a presentiment that, if they do not move, they will be left behind...