OFFICIAL REPORT OF THE DEFENSES OF NEW-BERGEN.

Among the documents found was the following, which bore no signature, and was apparently the rough draft of a report subsequently sent—four guns, but little resistance was made to our fire before the rebels deserted the fortification. The shot and shell poured in rather too fast for them from the gunboats. A small force were landed by means of yaws, and the glorious old Stars and Stripes waved proudly over the spot lately guarded by the rebel standard, solaced by the enthusiastic cheers of the men engaged in the work.

Newark, N. C., March 11, 1862. To Brigadier General O. B. Brown, commanding—

At about this time, a force of rebel cavalry was discovered a little back of the woods on the shore, and boats were instantly despatched to fire into them. A few shells from the boats scattered them like chaff before the wind. The horses being compelled by their riders to make double quick time out of the reach of danger.

The fleet then continued on its way, led by the flagship Delaware, and a short distance ahead another rebel boat was discovered, mounting some fifteen guns. This was called Fort Thompson, and, like the other battery, needed but a few shots to effectually silence it, and make its defenders (?) beat a hasty retreat. The greatest surprise and disappointment was manifested at the little courage displayed on the part of the occupants of these forts, two or three well directed shots sufficing to frighten them into a retreat. Here again a force was landed in small boats, and the "flag of the Union" floated defiantly above that of the cowardly rebels. Night approaching, it was deemed advisable to stop any further operation until the next day, when the victory would be continued with the same success. Tired out with the day's exertion, the men slept soundly, with the exception of those who were on picket duty, naval vessels being chosen as guards.

The next morning (Sunday, the 14th inst.) a very heavy fog lay upon the surface of the water, rendering objects but a short distance from you invisible. It lasted only for a short time, as Commander Rowan signalled for the rest of the boats to follow his lead and run the Delaware straight ahead, taking the risk of an accident, and the steamer passed over this fearfully dangerous ground in perfect safety, with the exception of the Stars and Stripes and the Picket, both being slightly injured in the hull, but not sufficiently so to prevent them from proceeding. The torpedoes which were destined to do such terrible execution among the vessels being left behind still lying harmless in the beds in which they were planted. A very brisk fire was kept up by two guns from Fort Thompson, but as far as I could discover without the least effect upon our gunboats. This fire was suddenly put a stop to by the well directed shot from our side, which struck one of the columbiads on the muzzle throwing it from its carriage and spreading consternation among the men. This was the finishing stroke. The rebels left the battery in double quick time, and another fort was ready for the victorious Stars and Stripes to assault over. Still another fortification lay before us, and still another defeat for the enemy. Fort Ellis mounted nine guns, and it was understood that quite a force had collected there from the batteries that were hoisted on the way up. A brisk fire was kept up here on both sides for a short time, until a shell from one of the gunboats went through the muzzles, exploding it with a terrific report that many "may" inside the fort. It was afterwards claimed by some of the rebels that the shell that did the execution was one of their own that burst by accident; but I have very good proof that such is not the case. A panic was now created, the rebels flying in all directions, leaving the fort to us, without injury in the least. One more little fort lay before us, that passed and the city of Newbern was at our mercy, and in a few minutes more in our possession.

We carefully approached Fort Lane, expecting a hard fight, the men on all the vessels only too anxious to show how they could handle a gun, and much elated by their previous victories. But a bitter disappointment awaited us, the rebels had seen quite enough of the way in which we handled them and offered little or no resistance. Fort Lane was small and well built, and had the rebels a particle of pluck, they might have annoyed us exceedingly. As it was, on we went to the city, and as we approached, we could plainly see the light of a large fire in the northern extremity, which, upon examination, we found proceeded from a number of large scows that had been filled with turpentine and other combustible articles. It was intended that these should be used against our vessels to try and burn them; but when they wanted to burn them away to us not an inch would they move, but floated away most vigorously on the spot where they were lighted. As we neared the city trains could be seen crossing the railroad bridge, and several shells were thrown at them, but without any effect, the cars passing over in safety. Had we arrived twenty minutes earlier, we might have cut off the retreat of the rebels, and captured a captured a large number of them, but as it was they escaped. We then shelled the depot, and the track as far as possible, and the Delaware and two other vessels passed off to the right side of the Neuse River, and moving round in a circle to the north part of the city, fired a few shells at some vessels lying there. A white flag was soon raised and the vessels given up. The troops now had but very little to do, as shortly after the boats crossed over to the city and took possession of it.

It is somewhat singular that with the number of forts captured by the fleet, and the immense amount of firing done, the Navy did not lose a single man or sustain any injury of consequence to the vessels. All the officers and men acquitted themselves with a nobility, and it is only to be regretted that they had not more of the better worthy of their steel to contend against.

General Burnside's Congratulatory Address to His Troops. GENERAL ORDER—NO. 17. HEADQUARTERS DEPARTMENT OF NORTH CAROLINA, NEWBERN, MARCH 15, 1862.

The General commanding congratulates his troops on their brilliant and hard won victory of the 14th. Their courage, their patience, their endurance of fatigue, exposure and toil, cannot be too highly praised. After a tedious march, dragging their howitzers by hand through swamps and thickets, after a sleepless night passed in a dreary rain, they met the enemy in his chosen position; found him protected by strong earthworks, mounting many and heavy guns, and in an open field themselves, they conquered.

With such soldiers adversity is victory! The General commanding directs with peculiar pride that as well deserved tribute to raise in the second victory of the expedition, that each regiment engaged shall inscribe on its banner the memorable name "Newbern!" By command of Brigadier General A. E. BURNSIDE, Lewis Richmond, Adjutant General.
