

THE COMMUNE LEADERS IN THEIR FINAL HOURS OF POWER.

General Dombrowski held a review of the Second regiment of National Guards to-day at Neuilly. There is nothing remarkable since the installation of the Commune in the fact of a review being held anywhere, as we have had several of them upon a small scale already; and, in fact, you may see one almost any day, either of a battalion, or a regiment, or a company or some other imaginary military division conceived by the extraordinary and insubstantial organization of the Commune.

DELESCLUZE SILENT AND THOUGHTFUL.

The review, however, held under the very guns of the batteries at Courbevoie and Brecon and the growing ferocity of Mont Valerien was intended to show the people of Versailles, just over the way, that, so far from being discouraged and disorganized by the loss of Issy and Vaucluse, the troops of the Commune were never in a better condition nor more inclined to fight than at present. Accordingly they were drawn up in line on the Boulevard Eugene to the number of about five thousand to await the arrival of General
