

WITH THE BRITISH ARMY IN THE FLANDERS DRIVE

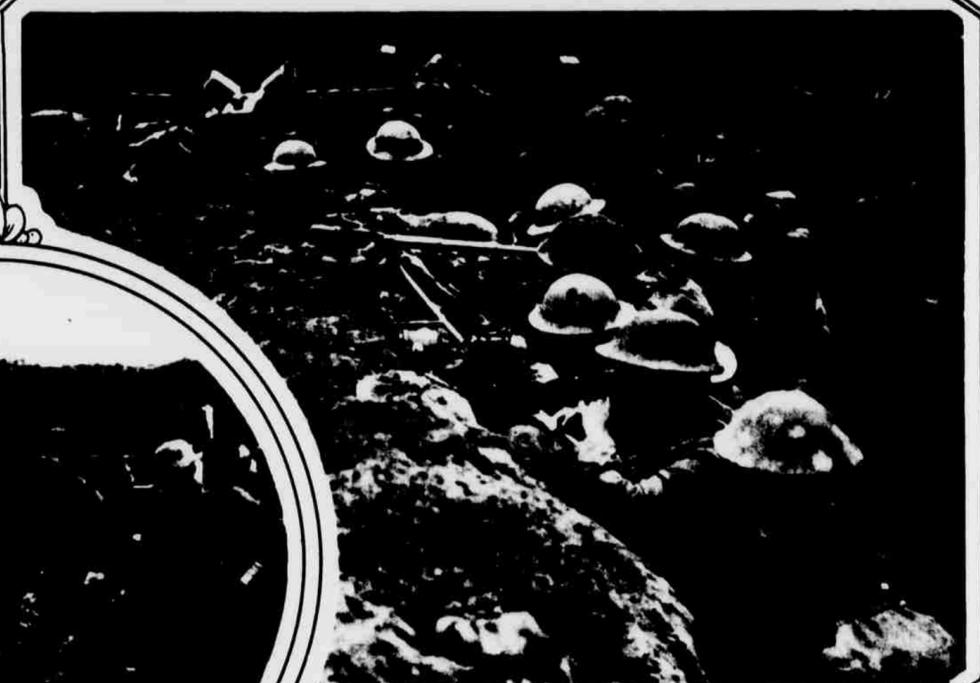

The message home. A British army surgeon taking down a few words from a badly wounded Tommy, who is waiting for the stretcher bearers to carry him to the rear, after the great battle of Menin Road. ©

German prisoners passing through British dressing station during the morning of September 20, while the Allies' attack was still under way. They get exactly the same attention as the British soldiers themselves. Hundreds were wounded in this battle. Photos Underwood & Underwood.

Three sorry looking Huns who were terribly shaken by the British barrage fire. In the fight for Vampire Farm they were glad to surrender the first chance they got.

Waiting for the order to advance. The British have laid down the barrage and a hail of death is now showering the German trenches. These north county troops in the reserve trenches charged a few minutes after this picture was taken.

Taking down all the particulars about a wounded man so that his relatives in England can be notified without delay just exactly what his condition is.

Some of these wounded are British, some German. The British surgeons make no distinction between them.

German prisoners dodging a shell burst as they carry away the wounded in the fight along the Menin Road. Frequently wounded men are killed or wounded again in the journey from the firing line to the rear. ©