

The most recent picture of the late John Redmond. He is shown (right) leaving Trinity College, Dublin, after a session of the Irish Convention, with Sir Francis Hopwood.
Photo, Central News Service

Wash day at the front. The conditions under which the men live in the trenches cause them to look upon soap, warm water and a tub with veneration.
British official photo, copyright, Underwood & Underwood.

British munition workers on a visit to the front. They labor with greater zest when they see the hardships their countrymen endure in the trenches.
British official photo from Underwood & Underwood.

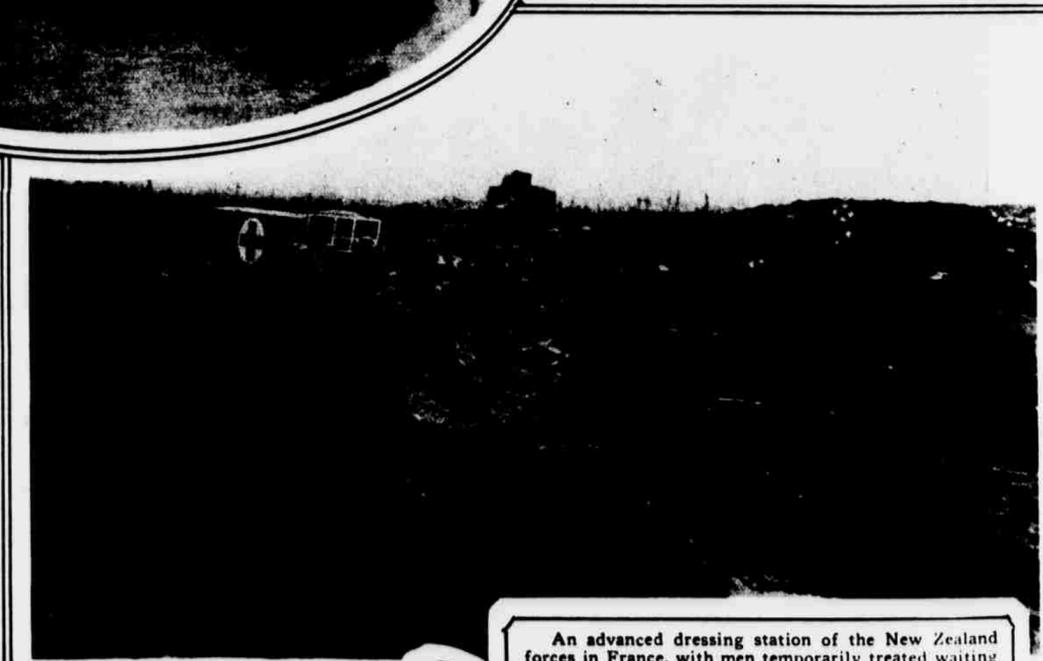

It was characteristic of the Japanese that when this military aircraft fell recently they propped up the wrecked machine before they dug out the aviator, who died later.
Copyright, Adachi.

At left—The difficulties of travel in Palestine and how the tractor conquers them. It takes a mighty formidable obstacle to stop one of these machines.
Photo from Underwood & Underwood.

While it is natural to bombard buildings put to military uses, the Germans have shown no discrimination in that respect in France. The chateau viewed here sheltered no troops or munitions, yet it was destroyed as ruthlessly as a fort would be.
Photo from Bain.

An advanced dressing station of the New Zealand forces in France, with men temporarily treated waiting to be carried to the field hospital in the rear. A Red Cross ambulance has already been partly loaded. On the brow of the little hill is the hut where the medical men have established themselves. It is near the trenches.
Photo from Underwood & Underwood.