

On they go and the Huns can't stop them. American doughboys advance through the German barbed wire somewhere on the front in France. Copyright, Committee on Public Information.

French Pictorial

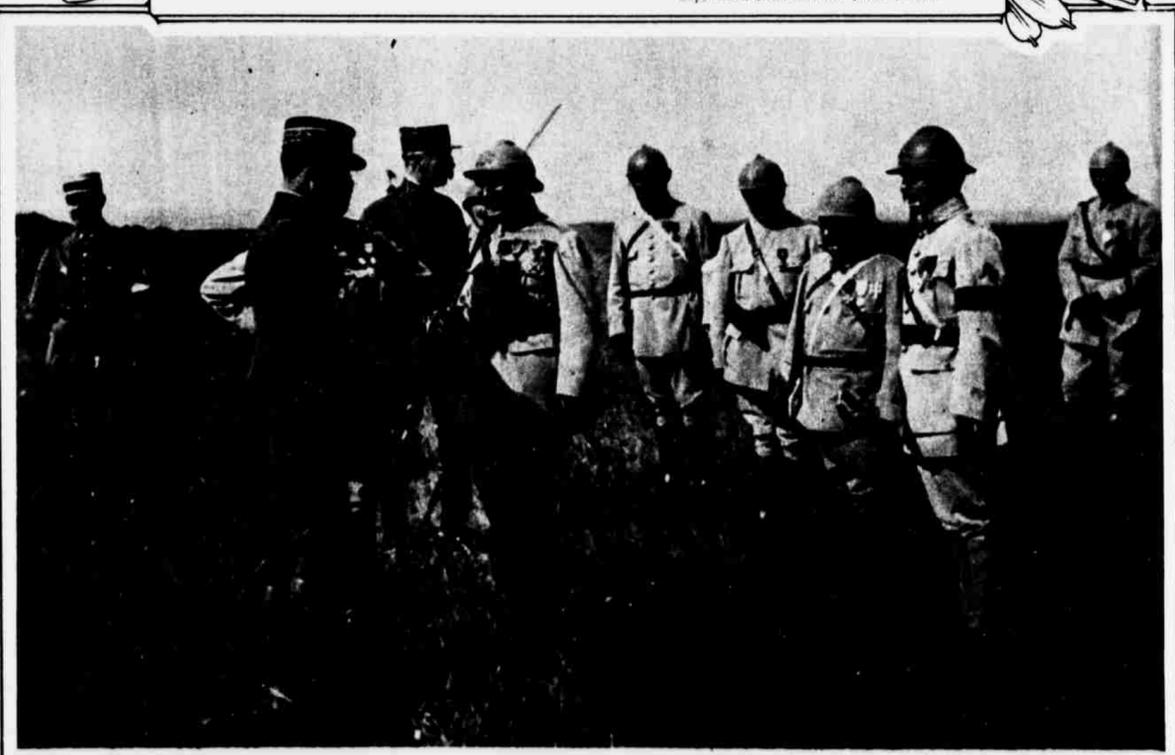

This is the newest wrinkle in trench mortars. The shells are fired into the Hun trenches by an electrical contrivance.

War can't stop baseball over there. The game shown here was played recently on an improvised diamond only a mile or so from Chateau Thierry. Copyright, International Film Service.

The man in blue is President Poincaré of France, on a visit to the trenches on the Marne front just before the start of the great counter-offensive. Photo, French Pictorial Service.

The one armed General is Gouraud, who commands the Allies on the right of the Marne salient. He is seen inspecting his troops just before sending them into action in conjunction with Gen. Mangin's thrust on the left. Photo, French Pictorial Service.