

EX-MAYOR VAN WYCK DIES OF INFLUENZA

New York's First Head Under Enlarged Charter Spends Last Years in Paris.

HIS CAREER TEMPESTUOUS

Once Tammany's Foe, Later Its Idol—Physically Brave and Defiant of Public.

PARIS, Nov. 15.—Robert A. Van Wyck, who was the first Mayor of New York city under its greater charter, died yesterday in his Paris home, following an attack of influenza he contracted 48 years old. Funeral services will be held on Saturday in the American Holy Trinity Church.

R. A. Van Wyck was celebrated for his physical bravery, indifference to public opinion and loyalty to Tammany Hall. He once plunged into a river and saved two girls from drowning. It was he who made the historic remark that Big Bill Devery was "the best Chief of Police New York ever had."

Van Wyck was Mayor when Croker was in his heyday as boss. Both feared themselves to the Tammany of that day, and there are still Tammany men who insist that none of the harlots that were said about Van Wyck was justified, he being a victim of the unparalleled misrepresentation and persecution.

He was of the Van Wycks who trace their line through the Dutch colony and back to Holland. He was born in the home of his lawyer father, William Van Wyck, a one time President of the Board of Education, 652 Lexington avenue. Through his mother, a Southern woman, he was distantly related to Senator Hoke Smith of Georgia.

Once Was Foe of Tammany. Returning to New York he opened a law office and joined Tammany Hall. But in 1890, when Hancock ran for the Presidency, and Tammany led by John Kelly knifed him here and helped to accomplish his defeat, the young lawyer rebelled, denouncing the party and read out of the organization. Joining the County Democracy he ran for office twice and was defeated. Later he returned to Tammany, which was then so positive and pedigreed character back. Peace being restored he was elected a Judge of the City Court, this starting his career as a holder of public office. In 1895, upon his reelection, his associates of the City Court made him Chief Justice. Two years later Croker named him as the Democratic candidate for Mayor, and in the election he defeated Seth Low and Gen. Benjamin F. Tracy. In the campaign he made just one speech, and it contained only 187 words.

Most of the vast amount of patronage provided under the new charter for the enlarged city of New York went to Tammany Hall, and the Mayor began his term on January 1, 1897, as a popular idol. What followed was inevitable considering the conception of the purpose of public office held by the Tammany leaders of that day, and the presence of an acquiescent Mayor at City Hall.

In Mayor Van Wyck's second year the Maset legislative committee came to New York to inquire into the conditions and found material for a series of sensational exposures.

The appointment of Devery as police chief was a blow to Van Wyck.

He was physically brave and defiant of public opinion.

He was a victim of the unparalleled misrepresentation and persecution.

GENERAL H. C. KING DIES AT EIGHTY-ONE

Won Distinction as Soldier, Lawyer, Musician, Writer and Business Man.

FATHER CABINET OFFICER

Won Congressional Medal in Civil War—Clerk of Plymouth Church, Brooklyn.

One of the most versatile of Americans, General Horatio Collins King, soldier, lawyer, musician, writer, orator, publicist, business man and wit, died yesterday of heart failure in his home at 46 Willow street, Brooklyn, at the ripe age of eighty-one.

General King's achievements are surely a proof that there is something in the blood of a line of soldiers, men who played their part in the Revolutionary war, and the war of 1812. Himself an editor and deeply interested in 1859 giving the name of Horatio King, who was Postmaster-General in President Buchanan's Cabinet. At the time of his birth in Portland, Me., in 1817, he was the son of Horatio King, a Jacksonian Democratic politician.

General King was a Democrat most of his life. He was appointed Judge of the District Court of the County of New York in 1871, and continued in that office by Gov. Hill, and in 1895 was the Democratic candidate for Secretary of State and ran for the office of Governor.

Gen. King's education began at the age of five, for the official position of his father, who moved to Washington when the boy was less than two years old, brought him into contact with the military life, and he was sent to Emory College in Virginia, and later went to Dickinson College.

In 1858 he graduated with honors and started to study law in the office of Edwin M. Stanton, who was afterwards President Lincoln's great Secretary of War. Meantime he joined the National Guard, the crack company of Washington, and did his first service as a sharpshooter on the hotspots along Pennsylvania avenue at Lincoln's first inauguration.

When the first shots of the civil war sounded the young man was eager to enlist, but his family persuaded him to wait until the war was over. He was appointed Secretary of the National Guard, and in 1862 was promoted to Major. A year before that he was the son-in-law of General Merritt. His gallant conduct at the battle of Forts caused Gen. Devitt to recommend that Major King be brevetted Colonel.

He served till the end of the war, then returned to New York, where he became associate editor of the New York Star. He was widely known as a contributor to magazines, and was famous as an after dinner speaker.

And in the midst of all these public activities, the General was a family man. He was married to Miss Letitia Howard, daughter of John T. Howard of Brooklyn.

His Activity Enormous. Meantime his interests widened out, so that to one who did not know how intellectual he was his accomplishments were not surprising.

He joined the National Guard and went into office as a volunteer. He was a contributor to magazines, and was famous as an after dinner speaker.

James A. O'Gorman quoted Richard Croker as having said of Van Wyck: "He was a man who was not only a man of letters, but a man of letters."

He was a man who was not only a man of letters, but a man of letters.

He was a man who was not only a man of letters, but a man of letters.

He was a man who was not only a man of letters, but a man of letters.

He was a man who was not only a man of letters, but a man of letters.

He was a man who was not only a man of letters, but a man of letters.
