

The Yanks used to sing a song that ran "By and By We'll March Into Germany." The song came true. Here they are, the American columns of occupation, advancing that way after the armistice was signed.

Copyright, French Official Pictorial Service.

Another view of the Yanks passing through French villages that had been held—and wrecked—during four terrible years of German occupation. It has been a triumphal procession for Pershing's men and everywhere they have been acclaimed as deliverers.

Copyright, French Official Pictorial Service.

The youthful Duchess of Luxemburg, with Gen. Pershing, reviewed the American troops passing through the liberated capital of the duchy.

Copyright, Western Newspaper Union.

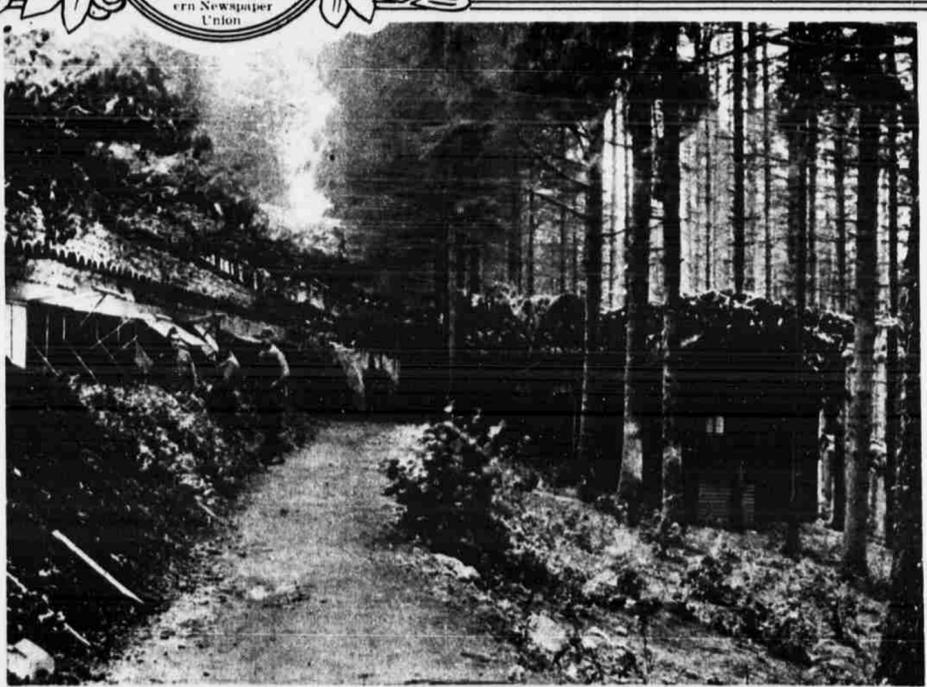

The war is still on in Siberia. Here an American doughboy, with British sailors, is peeping through a crack, watching the arrival of allied troops at Vladivostok.

Photo Gilliams Service.

American soldiers on leave in Paris have something of a time ending their way about the city. To help them out maps and directions printed in English have been widely circulated.

Copyright, International Film Service.

The camouflaged headquarters of the 26th Division, A. E. F., in France. The entrance to the dugout is also shown. This division is one of those that will probably be in France for some time to come.

U. S. Official Photo, from Western Newspaper Union.