

MAJOR HIGGINSON, BANKER, DIES AT 84

Founder of Boston Symphony Orchestra and Noted for Philanthropies.

GALLANT RECORD IN WAR

End Comes in Hospital Few Hours After Operation for Old Trouble.

BOSTON, Mass., Nov. 15.—Mr. Henry Lee Higginson, banker, philanthropist and founder of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is dead, following an operation at the Massachusetts General Hospital.

The death of Major Higginson, who was in his eighty-fifth year, was a shock to his many friends as the banker and head of the firm of Lee, Higginson & Co. had been engaged actively in business up to a few days ago.

On Friday he was taken from his home on Commonwealth avenue to the hospital. His condition became so serious that an immediate operation was deemed necessary. He died at 8:30 o'clock last night. The news was not made public until today. The cause was a blood clot on the brain, according to his physician, Dr. F. G. Balch.

The funeral will be simple in accordance with the wishes of Major and Mrs. Higginson. The services will be held at 11 o'clock tomorrow at the funeral home of the late Charles B. Foots and daughter of the late Rev. Dr. Thomas S. Hastings.

"First Citizen" of Boston.

Major Higginson, among the great bankers, as among the colonial families of New England, singularly illustrated all that was old and most firmly established and most devoted to tradition and distrustful of change.

In 1916 he was the mentor of the Boston men who unsuccessfully fought against the appointment of Louis D. Brandeis to the Supreme bench.

But to be conspicuous personally in the daily news was always Major Higginson's aversion. He considered it a tortoise and a thing to be avoided by gentlemen. His many philanthropies really were done by stealth.

He founded the orchestra, "the greatest string band in the Western Hemisphere," and unsurpassed in the other, thirty-eight years ago. Its first concert was given on October 22, 1881.

The Boston Symphony was the first prominent orchestra in this country to be established on a permanent basis. Societies of music-lovers in New York and elsewhere followed Major Higginson's lead.

He carried his point, for not only did the twenty men affected by the ultimatum decline to join the union but the seventy-seven who were members soon resigned. At the time Major Higginson said that if he was allowed to carry on his work of the orchestra as he wished in life would not end with his death.

Major Higginson broke his habitual silence with two extended statements. He said the whole thing was a teapot temper, that the anthem had not been included in the symphony programme for Providence solely because it was outside the artistic composition of such programmes, that the request for it to be played was not communicated to the conductor or the orchestra before the concert and that neither Muck nor himself ever had refused the anthem to an audience.

He mentioned that Muck was not a Prussian, completely absolved him of any diabolical and explained that the Baltimore contract had been broken because the police there had forbidden the concert. He said, however, that he never had threatened to disband the orchestra unless the protests ceased. It was the newspapers which would disband it, if anything did, he said. In March, 1918, when the orchestra was about to play in New York, a number of subscribers, led by Mrs. William Jay, tried to persuade Major Higginson to retire Dr. Muck, at least during the Carnegie Hall and Brooklyn Academy engagements.

tion to enter the banking house of Lee, Higginson & Co. After Henry Lee's retirement in 1897 Major Higginson became virtually head of the firm. He was admitted to the Boston Stock Exchange in 1868 and to the New York Stock Exchange in 1876.

In 1891 he gave to Harvard an athletic field, the famous Soldiers Field, as a memorial to his friends who had died in the service, these including Charles Russell Lowell, Robert Gould Shaw, James Savage, Jr., Edward B. Dalton, Stephen George Perkins and James Jackson Lowell. In 1899 he endowed the university with $150,000 for the erection of the Harvard Union.

THOMAS H. HAMILTON HERALD EDITOR, DEAD

Was Considered Authority in All Things Financial.

Thomas H. Hamilton, for forty years connected with the editorial staff of the New York Herald, an accepted authority on matters of finance, died Friday night in his home, 32 Convent avenue, after an illness of two months.

Mr. Hamilton began his career on the Herald under the editor James Gordon Bennett, serving in various capacities. From reporter to the chief editorial writer and editor.

As financial editor of the Herald in 1890, a position which he held for more than a quarter of a century, he became acquainted with the most prominent financiers of the country and was regarded by such men as William H. Vanderbilt, J. Pierpont Morgan and Russell Sage as one of the best informed men on matters connected with finance and railroads.
