Judge Macdonald's Address.

Following is an address delivered by Judge A. Macdonald at a recent meeting of the Cherokee County St. Andrew's Society, the subject of which is "Burns, the Brightest Star in the Galaxy of Scottish Poets:"

Mr. Chairman, Ladies and Gentlemen:—The star that holds the place of first magnitude in such a constellation as the Scottish poets must indeed be bright, and he who dares respond to such a toast tonight requires nerve. Very few persons have a conception of their number. You cannot put the point of a pin down on the map of Scotland but it will rest on the birthplace of a poet of more or less celebrity. There is no nation in the world that possesses so many beautiful ballads as does Scotland, and it is to be regretted that so little of her authors is known. Were I to hazard a reason for the poetical bent of the Scottish mind I think it may be found in the studious as well as the social proclivities of their nature. Reared among scenes which have become classic, famous and important, great events in the nation's history, it became an impulse to recount the victories or deplore the losses in verse.

The moral worth of Scotland's songs can never be over-estimated. They have done more to make the Scotchmen what they are today than any moral quasion ever brought to bear upon them. The greatest deeds of Scottish valor are but the fruits of Scottish song, developing those finer, warmer, gushing attributes of our nature, and rousing all the God in man.

Scotchmen have ever been ready to defend their native land with either the song or the sword, the ballad or the bayonet. It is natural for the Scottish heart to burst forth in song, whether it be to express love, mirth or politics, and what a hold on the public mind these auld Scotch songs retain.

I doubt not that when the great day comes and justice shall be dispensed that "Bonnie Annie Laurie" will be held responsible for the death of more than one heart-sick devil of a Scotchman. Centered in this coronet of jewels there is a gem whose lustre shines supreme. This firmament of fiery orbs revolves around one celestial sun. This hemisphere of poetry has one grand magnetic pole to which the needle of inquiry irresistibly turns. The toast of the evening; the memory of Burns. 'Tis a toast, ladies and gentlemen, there is no end to. When a man has Burns put into his mouth he should keep it well shut or the subject will run away with him. I can fancy I hear my father remark: "There's that daft collant o' mine aye middling with something he cares naithing about," and conscientiously speaking he would be right, for men have made Burns the study of a lifetime. Volumes have been written about him, artists have painted him and poets dramatized him. Really, sir, the spirits of those great Scottish departed may be peering through the gloaming that veils the land o' the leal and lending to us, their countrymen, some of their genius to help celebrate the memory of their immortal chief. It would not surprise me if Burns himself be here tonight. I suppose there never was a speech on Robert Burns without some allusion to the "Cottars Saturday Night." A softer, sweeter, silken strain never was penned; a higher, holier, happier strain never told the tale of truth. Its warmth of devotional feeling has cast a halo around the Scottish fireside that is seen and felt in every christian land. How much it has made Scotland a debtor to Burns she may never know, but her sons may roam the wide world o'er if possessed of its spirit. They are made the more welcome for its sake.

Sir, may I lift my voice for "Auld Lang Syne;" 'tis like no other song on earth; it has almost ceased to be Scottish; it has been stolen by every nation and transcribed in every tongue; it finds an echo in every breast; it winds itself around the hearts of men who have dwelt together in unity and part and meet again. Dinna ye hear it? It is being sung just now in castle and cot, at home and abroad, wherever Scotchmen gather. There will not be a haggis drank here or elsewhere but it will form the benediction.

To resume the subject, there is one little song that has raised more monuments than anything else. Burns delivered his own eulogy when he wrote, "A Man's a Man for a' That." To the student of history it almost seems as if this continent of America was created by an all-wise Providence for the purpose of illustrating to the world the maxims contained in this priceless gem, and no one appears to have been more thoroughly impressed with this fact than the late lamented George Washington, as in all the vigor of his nature he turned up his sleeves, and with the valor of his own right arm and the edge of his hatchet he hewed from this priceless poem a monument to Burns which stands to this day, for he built it on the declaration of Independence and he called it the constitution of the United States, and the influence of this poem spread over our new lands from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and they sent out ships to every nation on earth and brought over cargoes of heathen Chinese, Russians from Sweden, Turks from France, Spaniards from Cork, and then jumbled them all up and mixed them about and taught them to speak United States, and then revealed to them what this grand thing was that they had imported from Scotland—that man, the man, the world o'er, would be brothers for a' that. And the land gave birth to one tumultuous roar of joy as they saw it clutched by the claws of the American eagle, and swooped around, mid the heavens blue till lost in the folds of the star spangled banner, and they changed its name to liberty.

Sir, I may as well quit here; there is no end to the subject and as I see in the eyes of our guests that sublime quotation from Burns, "Give Us a Rest," and hear whispered that other sublime quotation, "Put Him in His Little Bed," I will now sit down.
