THE MISSISSIPPI AND THE NORTH

The New York Times, of the 30th ult., speaks in very laudable terms of the expedition now preparing under General McCLELLAN to open the Mississippi river.

It recognizes the importance of this work as a great duty to the North-Western States. General McCLELLAN, it says, is a Western man, well acquainted with the Mississippi valley, sympathizing thoroughly with the anxiety of the people of Indiana, Illinois, Missouri, and Iowa, for the reopening of the Mississippi river.

Each individual member of the expedition will find a personal interest in the success, because, to a certain extent, the pecuniary prosperity of every one of them will be found dependent on the unobstructed navigation of the Mississippi river.

This expedition is at this time brought conspicuously before the Northwestern States to counteract the arguments of Gen. BRAGG's demands that the river be discontinued, which have begun to find their earnest and significant utterance. The Times characterizes it as the most "philosophic" expedition that has yet been set on foot.

In one sense the world is well chosen, for almost all political philosophy is at fault, the alliance between the Northwestern and the New England States cannot be much longer maintained, except by continuing to humbug the former with such delusive hopes as rest upon the success of any plan for restoring by arms the commercial use of the Mississippi.

It is the policy of the Northwestern States to be at fault, the alliance between the Northwestern and the New England States cannot be much longer maintained, except by continuing to humbug the former with such delusive hopes as rest upon the success of any plan for restoring by arms the commercial use of the Mississippi.
