promise, the Attorney General again met the counsel for Yerger, and the Chief Justice, this time together. He first asked the counsel for Yerger, to his proposition Mr. Carlisle replied that his client was in military custody and on trial; that he would probably be released, and if the delay occurred he might be executed before the court convened. This objection Judge Hoar met by representing the assurance the President directed him to make in his name. Mr. Carlisle then said he greatly desired to have the case decided, but with the promise made on the part of the Executive regarding the prisoner he would not make any positive objections, but if the Chief Justice was disposed to let the case go over he would not oppose his wishes. With this Mr. Hoar turned at once to Mr. Chase, and said the question rested entirely with the Chief Justice. He then went on to urge the wishes of the President upon him that so important matter should be heard by a full bench; and that as the counsel of the prisoner in whose behalf the proceedings had been instituted, were willing to rest the question of delay with him, both the President and the Attorney General hoped that the Chief Justice would not insist on hearing the case alone. These views were cornered, there was no way consistent with proper respect for his Associate Justice, but to submit. So, on the verge of a decision which both sides believed would result in the granting of the writ, the subsequent discharge of Yerger, and the virtual overthrow of military in the South, the agreement to postpone the case until the Supreme Court met was formally made.
