To-day the surviving soldiers of the Confederate army, accompanied by their relatives and friends, and all who sympathized with the cause which rearing years makes more hallowed, will strew the graves of their dead comrades with immortelles and wreaths of bright and beautiful flowers. Elmwood, most lately of the homes of the dead, never looked lovelier than it does now, decked as it is with the richest jewels of the opening summer. The many thousand new-made graves in which rest the dead of our latest war, no longer was the earthy color which once told so pathetic a tale. They are covered by the petals of mothers with a mantle of the same green as from year to year the renews over the remains of those who wore the gray. Everywhere there is evidenced the touch of that hand kinder than any human hand has ever known, and the private, and the general he followed, and the trumpet whose side was a summons to battle, slope side by side under the same sword. The same turf covers all. Flowers of like hue and profusion will mark them to-day in commemoration of services the south cannot forget; in commemoration of a cause that is lost, of a contest whose memories are among the priceless treasures of our history. Whatever the mutations of time, or the changes of policy or principle which it will bring, the south will not let the story of her "bravest and best" die, but will stand it forth afresh from year to year, crowned with the tributes of a grateful and a loving people.

We publish this morning a letter from Senator Harris, which will challenge attention, especially that of the merchants of a city whose members are members of the chamber of commerce particularly. What he says in defense of himself and Casey Young is the truth, as anyone can see who will take the trouble to consult the Congressional Record. Mr. Hill was undoubtedly mistaken as to the course of our senators and representatives, and his strictures and the resolutions which sustained them ought to be withdrawn in justice to two gentlemen who, since December last, have done more in behalf of our country than any other men in the chamber. The Nashville Banner says of Beecher's lecture there that "all his fine points were received with appreciated enthusiasm. He moved the audience to uproarious laughter, and stirred to the depths of sympathy. Once during the evening he attempted to draw his remarks to a close before having reached the end of the lecture, stating that he feared he had already wearied the audience, but was persuaded to proceed by loud cries of 'Go on go on!'

The temperance meetings are, we are glad to learn, being well attended and with the best results. One of the great evils of the time is intemperance. Indeed, it is the origin of a host of evils, all of which disappear whenever and wherever it is stamped out. One of the first lessons that women should teach their children is to be temperate in all things—in speech and conduct, in eating as well as drinking.

Dr. T. O. SUMMERS, Jr., writing from Cuba, says: "The further south I go—the nearer the home of the yellow-fever, the less interest I find in it. It is acceptable as the manifest destiny of the country, and when a case is reported it does not make a ripple in the ordinary affairs of life. There are no epidemic heroes here—they are only found outside of the yellow-fever zone."
