EMERGENCY AID

The Merion Branch Held an Enthusiastic Meeting This Morning.

The third meeting of the Merion branch of the Emergency Aid Association was held this morning at the home of Mrs. William H. Wanamaker, Jr., on Highland avenue, Merion.

Like the two former meetings, today's gathering was a most enthusiastic one, with three sewing machines busy all morning.

The number of surgical necessities turned in today at the meeting, which were made by the unemployed women supplied with sewing, amounted to over 170 pieces. These included 49 pairs of pajamas, 9 surgical jackets, 58 convalescent jackets, 8 scarfs, 11 dozen and 4 pillowcases and 23 wrappers.

A most interesting letter written by Mrs. Rudyard Kipling to Mrs. Edward Bok, acknowledging the quantities of old linen sent by the Merion branch to Mrs. Kipling, was read to the members present by Mrs. Bok.

Mrs. Kipling said the various old pieces of linen had been at once forwarded to the hospital fields in England.

Another interesting piece of news was the announcement that more than $40 had been realized at the musicale given by Mrs. Frederick G. Poth on Thursday. More than 300 women were present that afternoon at the Poth home.

It was decided at today's meeting that one-third of this money would be devoted to purchasing new supplies to be sent to the hospital fields abroad, the other two-thirds to be given over to alleviating suffering among poor families in the city. The means of reaching the poor in this city will be through the Society for the Organization of Charity, the Childs Federation Society and the University Settlement.

FRANKFORD

Miss Edna J. Reynolds, of Harrison street, entertained at a delightful little musicale Saturday evening in honor of Miss Anna Richmond, of Ithaca, N. Y. The house was beautifully decorated with cut flowers and ferns.

Mrs. Charles Carter, Miss Elsie Binker, B. Harris Knowles and George Kerkpatrick were the soloists of the evening.

Miss Ellen Clay Patterson has as her guests Miss Madeline and Miss Rose Beyer, of Atlantic City, Saturday afternoon. Miss Patterson was hostess at a box party, followed by a dinner, at the Adelphia Hotel, in honor of her guests, including Miss Clara Case.

Miss Anna Richmond, of Ithaca, N. Y., will be the guest of Miss Edna Reynolds, of Harrison and Mulberry streets, for two weeks.

ROXBOROUGH

In aid of the camp for the treatment of tuberculosis, established at Deer Mountain, Allenwood, Pa., by Dr. William Devitt, of 136 Green lane, the Aurora Dramatic Company will present the Western comedy drama, "Sunday," tomorrow night in St. John's parish hall.

The cast includes Miss Nellie Hennessy, Miss Mae Feely, Miss Margaretta M. Grenn, James Donnelly, Raymond McHale, James Ambrose, Thomas Conroy, George Smith, John Bowen and A. W. Fies. The patronesses are Mrs. Clarence C. Keever, president; Mrs. Charles F. Martyn, secretary, and Mrs. Lawrence Simcox, Mrs. William Devitt, Mrs. Benjamin Johnson, Mrs. Louis Michael, Miss Tische and Miss Elizabeth Barie, members of the Roxborough auxiliary of the camp.

LANSDOWNE

A dinner was given Saturday evening by Mr. and Mrs. Charles J. Pilling, of 48 Windermere avenue. Among the guests were Mr. and Mrs. Edwin Grayson, Mr. and Mrs. Robert Mahler, Mr. and Mrs. Harlan Page Stetson, Mr. and Mrs. Samuel Phillips, Mr. and Mrs. Frank McGuire and Mr. and Mrs. Marcor Bally.

MRS. WOOD ROBINSON

Mrs. Robinson, who was a recent bride, has returned from her wedding trip.

EDUCATION

IN SPITE of pessimists and radicals to the contrary, changes, whether for good or bad, but incontestably progressive, have penetrated to every phase of life. Religion has its "Billy" Sunday, literature is Gertrude Stein. Even the shaded cloisters of Academic Tradition have been invaded by manual training and vocational guidance, by Madam Montessori and Francesco Ferrer, whose martyrdom in Spain has given rise to a cult of anarchist schools all over the world.

Of 18 articles on educational topics in the current magazines, four are criticisms, satirical and even iconoclastic of academic conservatism; four discuss ethical and abstract considerations, two are descriptive, and the remaining eight, nearly half, are concerned with new and progressive possibilities and wrinkles in the art of teaching.

An article on "Academic Superstition and Democracy" (1), by a former member of the Vassar faculty, Florence Keys, cleverly unorthodox in itself, gains added significance, in that it is sponsored by the Yale Review, an unofficially official publication of the university. Contrasting the influence of the institution with the individual, she writes of the time when:

The universities were congratulating themselves on the production of certain curiosities in the shape of Latin plays, while a man who never as a student saw the inside of a university was writing imperishable poetry, leaving to his people an instrument to sound their mystery, from its lowest note to the top of its compass. For it is the great individuals, not institutions, that are the benefactors as they are the generators, of culture.

Referring to an article by John Corbin, comparing college democracy in England and America, she writes: Mr. Corbin acknowledges some surprise at finding Oxford more "democratic than any American university." He naively overlooks the fact that this is like the democracy of the milliners' club, where the cult demands it be at least assumed that everybody controls six eiphers.

An article on "Academic Freedom" (2) has an attractive autobiographical candor and sincerity, which perhaps borrows courage from being unsigned. It traces the growth in scholastic freedom, since 20 years ago, when:

I began life as a college professor, equipped with a Phi Beta Kappa key, a doctor's degree and a very solid, respectable habit of conservatism. Socialism was then a menial, and one who had grown to enormous dimensions in distant Germany. Today it is a semirepresentable and wholly dull political party in our own United States. I am in constant contact with its members.

From my present viewpoint they seem to have the true old-time academic type of mind, its respect for authority, its lack of imagination, its wholly mechanical processes of thought. And I note with surprise that they are not nearly so inclined to give a hearing to the J. W. W. as some of my own more yellow colleagues.

It does not seem to me that there will be much heresy-hunting in the open. Large and established institutions are too well advised to go far in this direction. The recent conflict at the University of Pennsylvania is highly significant. What looked like a determined raid upon certain teachers in Wharton School of that institution collapsed almost instantly under a return fire of publicity.

On Spooling Soup

Of three articles on educational subjects in the new Unpopular Review, "Academe and Mayfair" (3) has the most characteristically sophisticated tone, as is appropriate to that knowing and precocious young quarterly. "The question of the social status of American college professors" is the theme of the article, and the writer finds several causes for its variability:

Their professorship does not of itself create social position. In this respect they differ from—let us say—archbishops and generals. It does not eject him. In this respect he differs from—let us say—tailors and undertakers. Sooner or later he and his wife come up before the bar of society. Why are some taken and others left? The reason lies in subtle differences which the uninitiated never see and which to those in control are of decisive importance. Perhaps the simplest way for the moment is to say that society speaks a lingua franca and that some academic people speak it, while others do not. It is either a second mother tongue or acquired by study. Some men go through life unperceptive of social usage.

They lack the keen eyes of a boy from the slums of Philadelphia, whose ambition to speak good English was discovered by a charitable lady. He came to her house for lessons, and one night he was invited to dinner. Later in the evening he interrupted the lesson by a sudden question. "Do you spoon your soup out or in?" Her wit baffled for the moment, rose to the crisis, and she answered, "Out."

"I thought," he said, "I noticed you did."

A professor of history at Columbia, J. H. Robinson, is peculiarly fitted to write "An Explanation of the German Point of View" (4), having taken a doctor's degree in Germany and made a special study of his history. He gives a picturesque glimpse of Haackel. He writes:

Let me in October I found myself in a humble inn at Jena, and as I was waiting for my sandwich and saucer of beer, I picked up a local newspaper. It contained a leading article on "England's Blood-guiltiness in the World War," by one of the chief lights in the University of Jena, Ernest Haackel. The article brought up a vision of the distinguished biologist as I had seen him lecturing years before, looking in his laboratory apron like an uncommonly gifted shoemaker. I recalled the hubbub that his "Natural History of Creation" produced; how theologians had contended that man, with his divine reason, could never have sprung from an obscene monkey. Haackel's attitude toward the war interested me. I was shocked to see that 60 years of exacting scientific research and reflection had left Haackel as ready a victim of emotional logic as the blindest reservist.

Culture at $3.50 Per

There is nothing impractical or highfaluting about an article on "Cutting the High Cost of Education" (5), by E. V. Cooke, describing Fremont College, Nebraska, where 3500 students get board, lodging and an education for from $2.50 to $3.00 a week.

Please observe that this price is not bare cost. The college must make its profit. It must maintain its faculty staff of 45 professors, high-class equipment and provide for expansion, and it must pay taxes and interest on its investment. The school has not a penny of endowment, or State or national aid. You can get anything you want from a certificate to teach school to a bachelor's degree, from kindergarten to civil engineering. A deeply significant and progressive new wrinkle in teaching is described in an article on "Scientific Business" (6), by Melvin T. Copeland, which deals with the work of the Harvard Bureau of Business Research.

Established in 1911, by the Graduate School of Business Administration of Harvard University to gather facts about business for purposes of instruction. Market distribution was the first field, and the bureau concentrated its work at first on the marketing of a single commodity—shoes. A similar study of the retail grocery trade was commenced in 1914. In order to learn the exact costs of store operation, it early became apparent that a uniform accounting system was necessary. Many retailers were keeping no books at all.

The Harvard System of Accounts for Shoe Retailers was given to the trade in 1912. It has already been adopted by several hundred shoe stores and has become the standard of the trade. The results of this research, however, here of greater value to the retailers than the accounting system itself. The retailer hitherto has had no standards for comparison. The shoe retailer, for example, had no means of knowing whether he ought not to spend more than 5 per cent. of his net sales for sales force. Similarly, he could not know whether or not his rent expense was relatively too high. By working out actual trade standards from the detailed figures collected upon a uniform basis from a large number of stores, this research enables a retailer to know where he ought to stand. The information from individual stores is, of course, kept strictly confidential. Only the summaries for large groups of stores are published. The university as a permanent, trusted and non-competing third party, has a particularly strategic position for conducting such confidential research.

In the magazines themselves are conspicuous examples of the possibilities of adapting the principles of instruction to new uses. The Ladies' Home Journal and the Delineator are running one-sided correspondence schools of dancing, by means of double page "apreads" of the Castles, Pavlova, and Joan Sawyer demonstrating all the new dance steps, with directions written down the side of the pages. (7 and 8.)
