ENVOY FROM FRANCE ON GREAT AMERICANS

Ambassador Jusserand in His Best Vein—New Books, Light and Otherwise, for Summer Reading

Now dean of the ambassadorial corps, M. J. Jusserand has won a unique place in American hearts. He is one of the few foreigners who are really interested in America, and not given to superficial analyses of our national character and characteristics.

A slender volume more closely packed with great ideas than many of the encyclopedic books of the year is Woodrow Wilson's "The President of the United States," appropriately reprinted now from the President's Library on Congressional Government.

The "Letters From a Living Dead Man," which Elisa Barker set down and gave to the world, were of such puzzling, such inescapable stuff that most material that the strange dead hand was to be desired.

In "The War for the World" (Macmillan Company, New York), Israel Zangwill has gathered a number of his letters to the British press and his articles in periodicals, supplementing them with some original matter.

A breezy fust that clears solstitial literature of some of its malarial atmosphere of sex fiction is found in Samuel Hopkins Adams' "The Unspeakable Perk" (Houghton Mifflin Company, Boston). Mr. Adams in his most recent story prior to the one developed a vein of light and delightful humor.

Something oddly familiar came to the readers of Scribner's Magazine a few months ago. It was a memory of Little Lord Fauntleroy. The mystery was solved when the readers saw that Reginald Birch was illustrating another child story.

Mr. James L. Ford, author of "Watchful Watching" (Frederick A. Stokes & Co.), is a comparatively well-known writer. Presumably he writes so much that he never reads the papers. Had he read them, beyond the headlines, and thought about them a little, he could hardly have written so ill-natured, so false and so pointless a satire as this one.

Mr. and Mrs. Charles Mohr and their family, of 2521 South Fifteenth street, accompanied by Miss Rickner, have returned home after having spent two weeks at Wildwood.

Mr. and Mrs. Sigmund Moller, of 517 South Sixth street, announce the betrothal of their daughter, Miss Rebecca S. Moller, to Mr. Maurice H. Brenner, of Hazleton, Pa. A reception will be given by Mr. Brenner's parents in Hazleton on Sunday in honor of Miss Moller.
