CAPTURED

By Lieut. J. HARVEY DOUGLAS, First Canadian Mounted Rifle, A Troop, The Buffs (East Kent) Regiment, of a Wounded Canadian Officer Who Was Taken Prisoner.

The morning of June 1 broke bright and clear. For those of us who were off duty that day it was a day of rest and relaxation. The weather was excellent. They were very dry and had more head cover than the old trenches up in Sanctuary Woods. The fire step was square and solid and not crumbling away as in many of the other trenches we had taken over. The general system consisted of two lines about twenty-five yards apart—the front line contained the heavy weapons separated by heavy traverses to localize the effect of a direct hit. The second line contained all the light arms, and it was here that the men remained when not actively on duty in the front line. Three communication trenches joined these two lines on our company frontage. The second line was a slope or log structure trench without any bays or fire steps and it was really used as a communication trench to move the men from one part of the front line to another without the necessity of their passing along the front line. The brigade machine gun company had its guns mounted in excellent emplacements commanding our front and also the gap on our right which separated us from the second division, and which was patrolled only at night.

While investigating these machine gun emplacements I discovered Lieutenant A. W. Sims, of the Eighth Brigade Machine Gun Company, who had formerly been with me in the Thirty-fifth Battalion. This was the first time we had met since leaving England and we had many things to talk about. We sat down in a sunny spot of the trench and talked for some time. The trench was filled with our pipes and a pleasant half hour. The day was very quiet. Nothing disturbed us except an occasional salvo of machine guns, which are as harmless as a bottle of pills if you are flat against the front face of the trench. They are very annoying, however, if you are trying to snatch a little sleep in your dugout.

Talking of sleep reminds me of an incident which happened one time when we were in the old trenches at the Appendix. The officers' dugout consisted of a fire bay roofed over with a piece of corrugated galvanized iron sprinkled with about two inches of dirt. The parapet, which was our only protection from frontal fire, was hardly a better proof. The roof leaked like a sieve and one of Fritz's hand grenades thrown into No Man's Land struck so much dirt down on your face that you imagined you had swallowed a potato patch.

One of our officers had just entered this palatial residence one day and stretched himself for a short sleep on a drowsy couch consisting of a few empty sandbags laid on the hard earth. This was about one and a half feet wide, with Fritz decided to throw over a few "beer legs" (German workers). We got forty of them in about twenty minutes. The last one landed plumb in the center of the trench just beside the officers' dugout. It was a hole about twenty feet across, twelve feet deep and buried three of our men alive. We eventually managed to dig them out, however, unscathed, but shell-shocked. It was at this moment that the officer who had gone blissfully to sleep emerged from the so-called dugout, rubbed his eyes and muttered: "Say boys, what's going on? I thought I heard something." He was the son-of-a-bitch who shot me.

At least some of our observation balloons broke loose and started to drift over the German lines. The occupants had descended in their parachutes and our "beehives" (anti-aircraft guns) were using their best to destroy it before it landed in German territory. The Germans, thinking it might still be occupied also shelled it!

There must have been thousands of rounds of ammunition expended on this one balloon. The sky was white with puffs of smoke. Just as it disappeared from view we saw a German airplane go up and finish it off.

After supper I was sitting in the dugout writing home by the light of a flickering candle when I was informed that there was a corporal outside who wanted to see me. He turned out to be bombardier "Chuck" Gillespie, who had been with me in the thirty-first Battalion (French Mortar) battery located on our frontage. We had a long talk over the games of bowls he and I, Lieut. Douglas, Howard Brown and I had played in Toronto. All these boys were either in England or France. "Chuck" promised to bring Howard Brown, who happened also to be in the front line with the "Black Emmas," over to see me the next day.
