LEDGER SITE ONCE FLOWERING GARDEN

Tearing Down of Buildings for New Structure Unearths Ancient Traditions
EACH PLACE HAS ITS STORY

The restless prospector of the contractor's steam shovel that works every day in clearing the site for the first wing of the new PUBLIC LEDGER building is finding and unearthing fragments of many traditions.

This particular tract will be remembered as the longest "undeveloped" corner along the main business path of Philadelphia. In the seventy-odd years or more of the life of the buildings so lately demolished there ripened and decayed these traditions. Somehow, even with the sporadic repairs and spasmodic alterations, traces of them lingered.

The ground, according to oldest legend, was once mainly the garden of William Wain, whose house stood on the northeast corner of Seventh and Sanson streets. A high wall that ran up to Chestnut street and about a quarter of the way back on Sanson street (or, as a few laborers once called it even then, George street) sheltered the garden and protected it from profane glances. What the garden was like inside and what plants were grown there is not recorded, though some say they remember to have heard the place was famed for its hollyhocks.

Passed Into Another's Hands
 The house and garden were bought afterward (at just the time when the mercantile tide was creeping along Chestnut street) by one Dr. Swaim. This Dr. Swaim, by many accounts, had achieved no little distinction as the inventor of and holder of patent rights in a concoction that was specific for at least 61 per cent of the ills of mankind. He had, it appears, extended considerably not only the public health but his own fortunes. He moved his family into the Wain house and it became known as the Swaim mansion.

After a time Dr. Swaim caused to be built the row of buildings on Sanson street that, with a few exceptions, stood until this year. One of these he used as the salesroom for "Swaim's panacea."

Though the Swaim family lived on Sanson street long enough to become part of it, they in time turned their eyes to the more bucolic areas westward and presently moved to them. Dr. Swaim, however, continued to maintain his office and his control of the surrounding property. In fact, the panorama could be bought, wholesale or retail, in Sanson street as late as the Centennial year.

Adjoining the mansion was the building known to the second generation back as "Jones' Hotel," though it was at first a high-class Turkish bath. The present generation, however, knew it only as Mary Kunz's place. Mary, who for ten years ran an apple stand outside of it and for twenty more sold provisions inside.

One day the doctor decided to pull down the old Wain house, and there were built in its place four store buildings. The upper floors of these were set into one apartment and the great P. T. Barnum moved one of his saws into them. The scenery caught fire one night and the place burned down, as well as part of the house of George Harrison that had been put up next door. This was ten years before the Civil War.

The undisciplined doctor built three more stores on the ruins. These and the Harrison property next door became in time, respectively, the warehouse of William B. Wood and the cravat factory of Frederick Walton.

Was Philadelphia's "Newspaper Row"
 Meanwhile, in the environs, there were upheavals and changes. The then incomparable Public Ledger Building has been erected on the corner of Sanson and Chestnut streets. A couple of decades more saw the Philadelphia Press comfortably housed at Seventh and Chestnut streets, and a few more years saw the structure on the northeast corner of Seventh and Sanson streets.

At this time the street at Sanson street had given way to the shop of a jeweler, but Mary Kunz, it is supposed, had not then even so much as heard of Philadelphia. The jeweler's name is lost to history, but next him was a quality manager, to fix his name in men's minds, so that many can say it now, though the owner is dead many years. It was Sinner.

Next Sinner, going toward Chestnut street, was the office of a young, the tonmaster, and next that the shop of Louis a plumber. The north-eastern building was the shop and greenhouse of one of the most noted garden furnishings, and whose name is now known to connoisseurs and other lovers of the congenious over the whole country.

At Sixth street and Sanson in the building still standing there had risen what was perhaps the most famous restaurant of its generation—Covington's and Winkler's. Its principal offerings were Chesapeake oysters, Delaware fish, and clams and liquor for any occasion. It was boasted by patrons, nothing equal could be found in the city. It reached the peak of its fame and prosperity during the twenties and thirties, though it continued many years after that. It was the habitat of such native Bohemians as Walt Whitman and such naturalized Bohemians as Richard Harding Davis.

There had also risen below Sanson street on Seventh the hardly less well-known "Mrs. Bell's." Mrs. Bell died with a fortune.

These are but scratches into the rust grown history of the block—such details as could be dug from records or the memories of old men.

Had Whisky in a Thermos Bottle
 The Woodside Park police arrested two men in the park last night as boot-legger suspects. A satchel, which the men were carrying, contained, the police say, a thermos bottle filled with whisky, another thermos bottle filled with gin, a glass, and sliced lemons.
 The men said they were from Philadelphia.
