voice sounded. Mr. Jones stiffened perceptibly. "Indeed, yes, and a very reasonable figure it is, too. You must remember the housing situation—"

Lillian's face was truculent. I saw that for some reason or another she was deeply annoyed, and I hastened to terminate the embarrassing situation.

"I am afraid we have unconsciously misled you, Mr. Jones," I said with all the dignity I could muster, though I felt anything but dignified. "Forty thousand dollars is far more than we could possibly invest in a home. If you have anything to show us for less than half that sum we shall be glad to look at it. But this sort of thing is preposterous."

I do not know whether he caught my full meaning, for I referred as much to the exorbitant price set on the property as I did to my inability to touch the figure, but his florid face reddened still more, and he said with a touch of stiffness:

"We will go back and look at the places we have advertised. Those are probably within your means."

The Search Continued.

It may have been only the hallucination of my own sensitiveness, already irritated, but I never have heard anything quite so subtly depreciative and maddening as the phrase "within your means," uttered in the manner Mr. Jones used it. I think he was thoroughly annoyed at finding we belonged to the lower stratum of purchasers, for he strode ahead of us down the path to the gate.

"I warn you, Madge," Lillian murmured to me as we sedately followed him, "that I shall be arrested for murder before this day is over. There are two phrases that I think he was bloodily of the housing situation, and the other is 'everything has gone up because of the war.' Of all the miserable profiteering, shoving slogans that madly marked second-story work, old-fashioned burglars would blush at those are the worst! I've managed to control myself so far, but if that old goat gets off any more such spiels as 'I shall forget that I am a lady, a descendant of a proud southern or northern or eastern or western family, and seek him out,' I smothered the giggle I couldn't help at Lillian's nonsense, and walked more rapidly to the gate, climbed into the car and started it, demurely accepting Mr. Jones' rather chilly instructions as to direction.

"Great Possibilities."

"We will look at the acre property first," he said loftily. Alas for my dreams of a tumble-down place which Dicky and I could remodel according to our fancy as we would like to do with the Marvin home! As we drew up to the "acre property" I felt like paraphrasing the old nursery question: "Aren't acres who's got the acre?" A small house, attractive though with vines clambering over it, stood within fifteen feet of the sidewalk on a narrow lot. The houses on either side were so close that with windows open the neighbors could chat as easily as if they were in the same house. A lone lilac bush occupied the front yard, but we could see glimpses of taller trees back of the house.

"Oh, yes!"

"Oh, yes!" Just come back here and see. The best part of this property is in the rear. From sheer curiosity I followed him back of the house, which had several queer little ells and outbuildings, through a quaint little back yard with several wondrous trees, to a fence over which Mr. Jones waved his hand. "There's land enough for you," he said proudly.

We faced a lot as narrow in front as the one on which the house stood, but stretching to the next street, with not a single tree on it. I looked at it a minute, and turned on my heel without a word.

"Now," began Mr. Jones, "there are great possibilities in this place."

"Yes," said Lillian enthusiastically, "there are. You could move the house back, Madge, to the edge of this lot, buy the places on either side, tear the houses down, plant a lot of those birch trees that cost about five hundred dollars apiece, and you'd have a wonderful place."

Mr. Jones looked at her with cold disapproval. "I hardly think that would be practicable, madam," he said, and I bent hastily over a pretended loosened shoe lace to hide the laughter which I could not suppress.

WINIFRED BLACK WRITES ABOUT HABIT OF SCOLDING.

Copyright, 1921, by Newspaper Feature Service, Inc.

"Do write something," writes June, "about the people who are awfully nice to strangers and cross to the home folks. I know more folks who are bad to their own, than are good to them. How is it, and why is it?"

Dear June, your name alone entitles you to a reply, though I really can't answer, for I know no more than you why so many are a burden to the home, while they are favorites among their friends, out of the home range. I may guess at it, though, and it may be some comfort to you to know that a display of bad temper does not always mean that the cross and crabbed one hates the ones he or she makes so sad and sorry.

"Must Endure You."

There is balm in Gilead in a tiny poem of Mary Carolyn Davies which I read a week or two ago, and I am going to give you and my other readers the benefit of it:

Scold stronger, but be most polite. To those you meet at home each night. Be firm with callers; tell them clearly All their faults, and speak severely. Be sure that you conceal The unpleasantness you feel Toward the family; for they Must endure you every day.

Aye, there's the rub! At home they must endure every day and that makes it so much the worse. One can stand a rough word once in a way, but when it comes to be a matter habitual, it is like bumping over a long, rough road with no apparent ending. There is deep suffering laid up for offenders of this kind. Sometimes they awake when it is too late, to the misery they have inflicted upon those they love. The letters of Thomas Carlyle are steeped in regret for the life he led. Jane Welsh Carlyle merely by the unlimited use of his sharp and scorching tongue. But the wrong had been done and the eloquence could bring a touch of forgiveness from dead lips and a heart which had ceased to beat.

Just a Habit.

How many scolds there are in history and in literature. They have surely made their mark on the human heart and mind. From Xantippe to Rip Van Winkle's wife there is a long row of them, and no matter how much they were aggravated we never sympathize with the nimble-tongued victims. The good-natured, soft-hearted Rip lives in our hearts and reigns there despite the cause he gave poor Gretchen for scolding him.

Do not mind it too much, June, dear, and be sure not to catch the scolding microbe yourself. Like many evils, it is contagious in the atmosphere it creates.
