REVELATIONS OF A WIFE

How Dr. Pettit Managed Eva Dicky.

The ambulance will come immediately.

Dicky made the welcome announcement as he came into the room after his trip to the telephone. Dr. Pettit looked at his watch.

"They ought to be here in twenty minutes, then," he said. "Mrs. Ticer, will you make a pot of strong coffee at once, enough for all of us? Nothing else."

"Sure," Mrs. Ticer strode toward her kitchen.

"Dr. Pettit," My mother-in-law's voice was shaken, but still incisive. "I am also going to that hospital, not in the ambulance, of course, but Richard will drive Margaret's father and me. Will you see that we are permitted to remain within call?"

"It is not necessary," Dr. Pettit began, coldly, all the physician's professional dislike of confusion rising to the surface.

"Not necessary to you, probably," Mother Graham commented curtly, "but vital to us."

"I must insist upon going," My father's voice, suave, courteous, but with a note of finality in it, supplemented my mother-in-law's dictum.

Dr. Pettit, whose respect and admiration for my father is unvarying, gave an infinitesimal lift of his eyebrows, but promptly capitulated.

"Of course, if you wish it," he said. "Would you prefer my car, Mr. Graham?"

"No thank you," Dicky's reply was curt, almost to the point of offense, and I winced at his rudeness. I knew his intense dislike of the physician, but hated to have him display it at a time when life and death were in the balance.

The Right Note. "After all, it is just as well you do not," Dr. Pettit replied impudently, though I fancied I caught a gleam of resentment in his eyes. "For mine is a runabout, and I shall have to ask you to drive me back here from the hospital. And four people in the runabout would be a most uncomfortable arrangement."

I saw Lillian's hand move towards him with a light, impatient gesture, immediately controlled, and I shared the unreasoning but natural resentment I knew she was feeling at the intrusion of petty details into the black, bitter shadow which enveloped her.

I knew that to her it must seem incredible that any one could discuss the seating arrangement of a car while the little figure of her daughter on the couch remained so motionless, so devoid of any appearance of life.

"The coffee is ready," Mrs. Ticer's voice sounded low, efficient from the doorway. "Shall I serve it here?"

"Please," he returned, then he looked fixedly at Lillian, who had made an involuntary gesture of repugnant refusal.

"I must insist upon your drinking a cup, Mrs. Underwood," he said inexorably. "Not as a beverage, but as a stimulant. Your child may come out of this any time, and you will need all the artificial strength you can get. You must not fail her."

He had struck the right note. Lillian rose, and when Mrs. Ticer came back in with the tray, she was the first two days were occupied with the elimination contests and the finals will be staged Wednesday.

A Curt Command. "Shall I take two?" she asked quietly, when she had finished.

"No, one will be enough," Dr. Pettit replied, and when he had finished his coffee he came to me and held out his arms for Junior, who, excited by his reviving, had fallen asleep, once he had reached the shelter of my arms, for which he had been waiting.

"Get your coffee quickly," he said in a low voice. "The ambulance ought to be here very shortly. Please be ready to get right in it, up toward the front. I want you to hold Junior during the journey."

Dicky crossed to us in a single stride. "Give me the boy," he said, with a frown. "I can hold him and leave you free to attend to Marion."

"I must see to wrapping this arm so the journey will not jar it," the physician replied curtly. "Will you kindly get your mother and father-in-law into the car? You may go ahead if you wish. There is nothing any of you can do here."

He turned away abruptly. Junior still in his arms, and I saw Dicky's face flush resentfully at the dismissal. But there was nothing else for him to do except to obey the physician's dictum, and in another two minutes he had escorted my father and his mother to my car outside, and I heard the noise of its starting.

Now, Mrs. Graham, if you will help me," Dr. Pettit said, and with marvelously skillful and tender fingers he so padded the little arm that no ordinary jar could hurt Junior.

"Hold him so," he directed, "and carry him just this way to the ambulance. Sit here until it comes."

He drew up an armchair, eased me into it, then turned to Mrs. Ticer. "Three blankets and a sheet," he directed incisively, and though she seemed to move with her usual deliberation, it was but a few seconds before she had produced them.

"Mrs. Underwood, help me here. The command was curt, and I—watching the color rush back to Lillian's bloodless lips—knew that the wise physician had given her something to do just in time to save her from collapse. Between them they made a soft padded couch in short order, and then the horn of the ambulance sounded outside.

"Next—Why Dr. Pettit Watched Lillian Carefully."

5 TUBERCULOSIS PATIENTS AWAIT PLACE AT GALEN

Eight Have Gone From Cascade County in Year, Says Nurse's Report.

Five residents of Cascade county, ill with tuberculosis, are awaiting the opening in the Montana state tuberculosis sanitarium at Galen, according to the annual report of Miss Doris Mecklenburg, Cascade county field nurse for the Montana association for the study and prevention of tuberculosis. The sanitarium is overcrowded, according to Miss Mecklenburg, and eight persons were sent to Galen during the last year, according to the report.

Fifty-nine Examined.

Fifty-nine persons were examined for tuberculosis in the Great Falls office during the year, of which cases 34 were negative, 14 suspicious, three quiescent, eight active and 20 returned for re-examination. Homes of tubercular suspects in the last year totaled 127. During the last three years 33 patients have been sent from Cascade county to Galen and 88 active and 77 suspicious cases have been cared for.

Since May, 1921, baby clinics have been established at Belft, Stockett, Sand Coulee, Simms, Fort Shaw and Nehalem. Seventeen clinics have been held each month in those towns. During the Simms fair a "health booth" was jointly operated by the Red Cross and the Montana Association for the Study and Prevention of Tuberculosis under the direction of Miss Mecklenburg. During the past year 1112 infants were weighed and measured at all clinics; 1157 baby homes were visited and 24 pre-natal homes.

Crippled Children Helped.

Since July 1, 1920, four crippled children have been found, of which number two were operated on successfully.

Miss Mecklenburg reports that the goal set in anticipation by the sanitarium is looked forward to this year as a result of campaigns which will be carried on in Great Falls and the surrounding country until the sale is started. The amount of free literature distributed in the past year totaled 4025. Miss Mecklenburg gave 39 talks during the same period of time.

"White Paper" on Oil Denies England Has an Exclusion Policy

London, July 5.—(By The Associated Press.)—A "white paper" on the oil situation was given out Tuesday. It is in the form of a note which Lord Curzon, the foreign secretary, sent to Sir Auckland Geddes, British ambassador to the United States, under date of April 1. It gives statistics on the oil resources of every part of the British empire and showed an extremely small oil production and the absence of any general policy for the exclusion of foreigners from the oil producing areas. "It can hardly be contended that the restrictions impose any serious disability on foreign enterprises," the memorandum argues as regards the closed door policy. "No real parallel can fairly be drawn between the British empire, with its small and scattered production, and a country like the United States, producing two-thirds of the world's output within her home territory."

THE AMERICAN PLAN

The American Plan Provides:

1. That the constitutional right of every workman to seek and find employment and thus provide for his family, upon terms and conditions mutually satisfactory to himself and his employer, must not be denied or abridged.
2. That in all industrial and business relations the public welfare must always be regarded.
3. That there be absolute fairness to all classes of workmen, whether union or non-union, and justice to employers.
4. That there shall be no discrimination against any workman on account of his affiliation or non-affiliation with any labor organization and that any act of coercion, intimidation or force from any source whatsoever applied against employer or employee engaged in lawful pursuits is fundamentally unjust, vicious and un-American.
5. That the right of employes to organize for lawful purposes must not be disputed and that the same privilege should be given to employers.
6. That the employe has the right to leave his employment and the employer has the right to engage or to discharge his employes.
