Arthur Upson's Book Attracts Warm Interest From Carmen Sylva.

SHE WRITES OF THE POET'S WORK

Her Letter a Charming Essay on the Singer Compared With the Novelist.

Carmen Sylva, the poet queen of Roumania, has found a kindred spirit in a young Minnesota writer of verse, Arthur Upson, of St. Paul, now a student at the University of Minnesota. Mr. Upson, after making a study of Queen Elizabeth's poems was so much impressed with the community of feeling among poetical far better known pen name, Carmen Sylva.

Carmen Sylva has another Minneapolis correspondent, a well-known bibliophile, and to him also she wrote of her appreciation of Mr. Upson's poems and asked him to encourage the young poet in continuing to cultivate his poetic gifts. She expressed the hope that he would soon publish another book. This kindly wish having been communicated to Mr. Upson, he wrote the gracious and friendly critic that he would certainly publish another volume, if she would be willing to write an introduction for it.

This suggestion was promptly complied with. Mr. Upson has in his possession a delightful contribution to the literature of a new volume of verse, whenever he feels that he has enough good material to warrant him in publishing it. This he expects to do in the spring. The introduction was accompanied by a letter that is a literary treasure. The letter is typewritten but the poems which the queen had previously sent him were autographic. She explains that she writes the poems with her own hand because: "I am never sure of not making faults down altogether and has left nothing but the spoils of the poet's workshop behind. The great fault of the novel writers of our day is to be too physiological instead of letting the soul live its own very intense life. The books of Zola, therefore, are no novels. They might be written by a doctor and read to students, but not to women and young girls who need not yet know life from all sides!

The poems are always soul stories, only people do not understand them and don't know where to look for the source of them. And we don't care to show.

We don't care to let them know that small things have wounded us so deeply and very small things have been such a joy. They don't understand. But poet brothers understand each other thoroughly without explanation or commentary. We understand Kallidasa or Aeschylus without all their stupid explanations.

I do so hope that what we are in real communion with those that have gone before and what we call inspiration is sometimes dictated by some old bard who likes once more to speak the language of men on earth!

Some Royal Verses.

The queen poet speaks further of inspiration as such a curious thing and notes that the command of English has returned to her in some mysterious manner which she evidently thought due to inspiration. Earlier in life she used English as readily as German but for want of use had forgotten much of it until the occasion and desire to use it had called back a half forgotten power.

One of the poems written by the queen for Mr. Upson is in German and of this he has made the following metrical translation:

SOUGHT NEW NAMES

District Court Records Show Many Cases of Rechristening.

FOREIGN NAMES CONFUSING

"Jawbreakers" Have Been Simplified and Names of Embarrassing Associations Changed.

If you don't like your name you can change it, and that statement doesn't apply only to women of marriageable age and temperament, but to men as well. The thing is done at every term of court, and the court records contain notations of any number of men who have changed their cognomens for some reason or another. Some of the reasons appear trivial to all but the person most immediately interested; others do not. By far the greater number of petitioners are Scandinavians who have got into trouble through the confusion of names which so frequently arises among that people.

One reason advanced in court last July 15 of particular interest just now owing to the facts in the Nordeman suit is this: The Nordemans stated that they were foreigners in a strange land, and felt that they were discriminated against for that reason. Henry Polinsky, who had his name changed to Henry Mitchell, urged the same state of affairs; and evidently the court agreed that he spoke the truth, for he was permitted to drop the foreign surname, and to be known henceforth as Mitchell.

At the time of the Glog murder, some years ago, there were two Harry Haywards in Hennepin county. One of them was responsible for the crime and answered for it upon the gallows. The other, in order to escape the odium attaching to the name, had it changed to Smith.

Frank Billiter, who is well known in Minneapolis, is living under a name which he selected for himself, the selection affords a lesson for the courts. He was born in Italy and there was known as Domenico Carraciolo. That combination, however, proved a jaw-breaker for Americans and out of consideration for his friends Billiter had it changed.

Since Jan. 1, 1899, twenty-seven men of Scandinavian birth have changed their names by due process of law in this county. In each case the change was made to avoid confusion. In that number there were six Andersons, five Johnsons, three Olsons, three Petersons, three Nelsons and two Larsons. Two brothers, John and Carl Olson, had their names changed to John and Carl Langmo. Their selection of a cognomen was unique and they will probably have no more trouble. Nesmith P. Nelson became Nelson P. Nesmith. John Anderson was transformed into John Andrews. Nils Anderson is now known as Nils Anderson Kingbay, and his troubles are probably over, so far as errors in name are concerned, for the directory shows few Kingbays. Niels P. Nielson didn't like any part of his name, and he now answers to roll under the name of Edward Hastings. Thomas Nelson became Thomas Eldem, and Carl O. Bergquist is now Carl O. Burr.

Occasionally the files contain a case in which the petitioner originally dropped or changed the spelling of his own name, and now petitions to have it restored to him. In such cases the request has been granted, where there was nothing to indicate that it was made with other than good intent.

One man, who appealed to the courts, found his name a source of great humiliation. In the original German it was good enough, but as pronounced by Americans it carried with it a meaning never imagined by its possessor, who felt himself disgraced whenever his name was mentioned. Consequently he had it changed,

ASK FOR TWO MILLIONS

Presbyterian Clergymen Request Large Sum.

Pittsburg, Pa., Nov. 22.—The laity members of Pittsburg Presbyterian churches were treated to no little surprise at the banquet to-night given by Messrs. Robert Pitcairn, vice moderator of the Presbyterian general assembly; James I. Buchanan, Charles E. Speer and Samuel P. Fairbairn, in honor of Rev. Dr. Henry C. Minton, moderator of the Presbyterian general assembly, when college presidents from western Pennsylvania and Pittsburg clergymen asked for total funds for their several institutions amounting to $1,746,500.

Following are the amounts asked: Rev. James D. Moffatt, president of Washington and Jefferson college, $1,000,000; Rev. Dr. Isaac C. Ketter, president of the Grove City college, $200,000; Rev. Dr. Chalmers Martin, president of the Pennsylvania College for Women, $250,000; Rev. Dr. Richard S. Holmes, $14,000 for the New York Presbyterian mission building; Rev. William L. McEwen, $32,900 for the work among the foreign population in Pittsburg, and the Rev. Dr. D. S. Kennedy, $200,000 for the western Ohio seminary.

TOOLS AND THE MAN.

New York, Nov. 22.—Edwin Markham, the poet, made the chief address at the annual banquet of the Society for the Study of Life last night. He said that, while the old epic was "of arms and the man," the new epic is of tools and the man.

Chicago, Nov. 22.—Officials of the International Live Stock exposition say they expect here 1,000,000 visitors will attend the show at the stock yards week after next.

SIGNATURE OF THE QUEEN

writers that he dispatched to the royal depository of the poetical muse his first small volume of modest verse published a year or two ago.

This brought a quick and appreciative response in the form of a letter and three autograph poems, each of which was inspired by the perusal of his little volume entitled "At the Sign of the Harp." The dedication which followed the signature "Elizabeth, Q. of R." is:

In heartfelt gratefulness for real: . . .
: song . . .
: A gentle echo from beyond the . . .
: ocean in the far east. . .

with the typewriter, which in poems is fatal and spoils the sense." However she goes on to say that she uses the typewriter entirely for her manuscripts, as she finds it an effort which tires her very much to write and that her once fine writing is entirely gone. She says: "So you must appreciate the pain and keep the small paper, as there won't be many of them any more."

Her typewriting is full of amusing blunders and she complains of the inconvenience of the noise. She says of this: "I find that I make more faults the longer I write and have come to the conclusion that the noise tires my head."

"Brothers from All Eternity."

Of the kinship between poets the queen writes:

I am struck by the overbridged distances, of time and space, and by the great community of thought and feeling between all the poets of nations and ages. We seem to have been brothers from all eternity and to be one uninterrupted chain, with the same feelings and thoughts and experience. I mean Southerlebenszeit, through all the times! The Seelenleben is in truth the only ones that are worth being recorded, as the proportions of the outward events change completely in the soul into which they shed their rays.

Therefore, all biographies are false and must remain so, as no one attaches importance to things that had none, and leaves away things that have modified your way of thinking for the rest of your life. I once began an autobiography under the name of "Geschichte einer Seele," trying earnestly to sketch the outward life but to speak only of the inner thought and impressions.

The variety of the book struck the person to whom I read it. And, therefore, I want to begin again with more details, naming names, as names are quite indifferent, excepting where the great composers or virtuosos or remarkable men come in, et cetera! I don't know if one ought to attach importance to their personalities or let the soul alone get upon the other soul, without giving the names of the artist or great man. Yet, Rimbaud, whom I knew and can describe, or the terrible Muraviev, who I saw in the night at Wina, are interesting to describe and their names convey an immediate impression without description.

I don't quite know how to manage that. . .

I tried to render my childish impressions and thoughts as they were. It can be interesting and original for those who study souls without the scrape, and not in the amphitheater where generally the soul has Close not the full portmanteau yet!

Oh, still another song, I pray!
Again that chord. A tale that's set
To tones that rise and melt away!

Tones that will linger in my breast
As light as down or fresh-fallen snow,
I'll bet my heart with wild unrest
No more, but only soft and low.

A balsam drop for sorrow's bane
Hither in song the West Wind brought,
It drove away the throbbing pain
And ministries of healing wrought.

Oh, one song more! Nay, do not close
The old Portmanteau full to brim
Of songs unsung; but sing me those
To soothe me when my joys are dim.

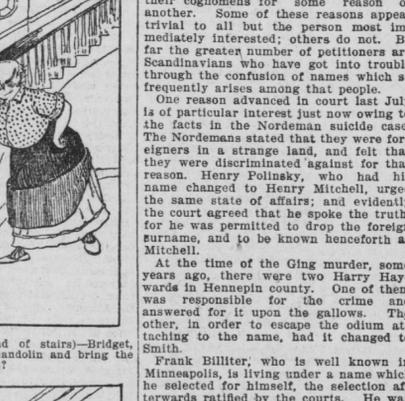

The following of the poems in English show that even in an unfamiliar tongue the queen's gift of song flows freely:

The heart is e'er a child, and wants a song,
To go to sleep with, over sobs and sighing,
Just to forget the cruelly dreadful wrong,
That tore to pieces it till it felt dying.

He is no minstrel who blasphemes and tears
The heartstrings, till they're wild and burst
In shaking
With storms or howling drowning, hopeless
years
O'er which the billows tossed in endless breaking.

Oh, blessed minstrel! let thy harp sound long
And low and soft when winter winds are sighing,
The heart is still a child and wants a song,
To sleep with and forget its wrong!

Mr. Upson, who is now a junior in the university, returned to the institution this fall after an absence of five years, during which all of his leisure has been spent in writing. His poems have been published in the Critic, the Independent, Smart Set, the Criterion, Youth's Companion and various minor periodicals.

In Furs, We Are Leaders in Styles, Qualities and Prices

The display of handsome furs to be seen here is a source of much pleasure to both customers and ourselves. We determined before the season began to spare neither time, pains nor money in assuming leadership in styles, quality and low prices. Our entire energy was directed to that end.

Now we can proudly look back upon the obligation and responsibilities necessary to attain leadership as real pleasure. The reward is sufficient, for in a past season have we been so well prepared to eclipse ourselves. Just a few words about kinds and prices.
