in Trial of Chris Bjork. If a man dispenses liquor in the pourse of his regular business, he can be convicted of running a blind pig, even if it is not proved that money was taken in exchange. The complaint, however, must specifically state the latter fact. This was proved by tupreme court records in the police court before Judge Dickinson this morning, when Chris Bjork was con-victed of selling liquor without a license at 4165 Washington avenue N. Attorney E. E. Waite insisted that the complaint state that there was no money transaction, and Bjork pleaded guilty. This is the second conviction in the war on blind pigs in North

ly after the news of the formation of independent booking agencies in New York and of the mutual protective association, which is backed by such strong men as Savage, Belasco, Weber & Field, Fiske and Hackett, seems to be no second trial.

The point upon which the defense places the most reliance is that the state failed to prove Viva Fitchpatrick had been divorced from her two form-er husbands. The defense attacked the indictment on the ground that it does not comply with the constitutional provision giving the defendant the right to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation against him. It is contended that error was committed in permitting the defend-ant's wife to testify against him, also that the evidence did not warrant the finding that there was a marriage be-tween Viva Fitchpatrick and the defendant.
