WANT TO KNOW

By Marion Alcott Prentice.

To Improve the Hair—Can you tell me of something that will cure dandruff and also something that will make the hair grow?—Miss M. D.

Be very particular to use only clean brushes and combs; impurities collect so rapidly we scarcely realize how unclean these articles become after a few days' use, and especially so when the scalp is inclined to throw off unnatural waste deposits. It is largely the unclean brushes and combs that are responsible for the starting of dandruff. Shampoo the hair thoroughly and frequently to cleanse the scalp, using a mixture consisting of one pint of warm water, the white of one egg, two teaspoonfuls of tincture of green soap and one teaspoonful of violet water. Stir the mixture until well-blended, rub into the scalp and complete the process in the usual way. Improving the circulation of the scalp will also tend to discourage the formation of dandruff and assist nature in throwing off natural waste. Massage the scalp twice each day by going over the entire surface several times, gently rubbing and picking up the skin between the finger tips, being careful not to irritate or pull the hair. To stimulate the growth of the hair I know of nothing better than the time-honored compound of one ounce of oil of rosemary, three ounces of tincture of cantharides, one ounce of olive oil and six ounces of best bay rum. Apply to the scalp before retiring, after brushing the hair free from dust, and rub in gently. Avoid as far as you can dampening the hair too much, as it is apt to make the hair smell musty where it presses against the pillow during the night. Allow it to dry thoroughly before going to bed to avoid any disagreeable odor.
