A BEAUTIFUL OPENING

The Young-Quinlan New Store Shows the Artistry of the Trade.

So beautiful a display of goods amid so beautiful surroundings was never shown in the west as was displayed at the Young-Quinlan opening today. The display began at the main entrance. The great window at the right was decorated only with iridescent, gauzy-but-terflies, but the real decorations were the few coats and costumes. A Callot gown of French Irish lace, beautiful as only that lace can be, and graceful as only a Callot gown done in Empire fashion can be, stood in the center, the heavy pattern standing out like carving, the lines clinging to the figure with a promise of becomingness which only Callot can give. Beside it was a Princess gown in lace and taffeta, tulle, Paquin, looking as if it had grown together, and a real Irish crocheted lace luncheon coat in rose pattern and champagne color, the petals of the pattern standing out in relief and free as they did not until the French taught the Irish how to put dash into delicacy. The window at the left held beautiful of a like quality, all bearing the unmistakable stamp of the best Parisian designers.

The store itself is a model of taste and novelty. The idea that it is a shop has never been forgotten, while coloring and magnificence have at the same time had full play. At each entrance one gets a sweep of view from front to back of the entire store, the green walls and carpet blending harmoniously together; toned by a paneled ceiling that suggests cream with a hint of green in it, and set off by a soft framing of deep mahogany, and accordingly followed by sage. Great vases of ferns and Easter lilies surmounted the tops of the red-brown of mahogany, southern similar tradition, and from the chandeliers hung a wealth of smilax in which huge stalks of lilies were caught.

At the back of the room on a low mahogany table an immense horseshoe of pink and white roses leaned against a green pillar, and in the center were the initials of Mr. Young and Miss Quinlan set in a mosaic of white and rosebuds. It was a gift of the employees.

Suits and separate waists occupy this floor. The furnishings are solid mahogany. The whole place is airy, but there are no hangings—there's a broad sweep of light and everything was toned down to make a wonderful background. The color of every description stood where they would show most naturally, an illustration of the daring mingling of color which makes the entire store, and which described, would sound hard, but which studied, is more delightful than can be imagined. Sage blue and the differing greens stood together, and a dream in the color of charmes, tempted comparison with a street taffeta in that new color between a reseda and olive green, the blouse broderie Anglaise over a swirl of lace. The linen out-of-door conspired to suggest to say that they are just the thing and of many designs. A tailored Duse in sage blue and redingote was among the stunning things both in American manufacture and Parisian. Up the broad hall and smilax-twined stairway, where half-way is a landing for waiting room, the crowd wended its way to the upper floor, which broke into a new beauty. The first room, in mahogany and green, is for French lingerie. No prettier sight could be imagined than the display of hand-embroidered negligees. A princess gown and a waist—more morning gown than negligee—was rarely enticing in valencienness and the sheerness of mull, thru which a well pink lining showed, and accentuated the sprawling design of roses clambering over the entire gown. Others were equally beautiful. Every thing in lingerie, from comparatively plain to the most richly embroidered was shown, the noticeable thing about both French and American lingerie being the absence of all-over ornamentation. Richness was to be used to preserve simplicity of appearance.

The millinery and imported gown rooms are the most exquisite, if in white can be made. They are in white and rose. The hats and cases carved in the simplicity without heaviness, which marks the genuine Louis period. The entire center is a big circular room, where the hats and cases to delight the eyes are shown. A Callot gown in champagne batiste, embroidered in all-over open work, is shirred to the waist in princess fashion. An extremely pretty thing to speak about, but one of the handsomest gowns ever shown in the city. The hats are very beautiful. With the setting of white lilies used for decorations, with a hydrangea plant here and there, and the French chalets in white with green panels and French carvings, the windows hand-painted in designs representing a spring morning and a spring sunset, opening from the main room; it was a scene of harmony and utility that no Minneapolis woman can afford to miss, and that women do not intend to miss. If the crowd in the rain can be trusted as evidence. It was a buying day rather than a show day, and decorations in the afternoon showed only "tried on" in the long triple mirrors wreathed in their carvings of French roses.
