MAUMA SANGUA PRINCESS' CHILD

INTERESTING STORY OF AN OLD SOUTH CAROLINA NEGRESS.

The Wife of Governor Pickens' Coachman Who Has Reached the Great Age of 105 Years—Her Career Has Been One of Steadfast Activity and Industry.

Charleston (S. C.) News and Courier.

The most unique character among the negroes of Edgefield county is old Sangua Henderson, properly known as "Mauma." Years may come and years may go, but the tall gaunt form of the old woman may be seen striding over the cotton fields or looming up in the wooded path on her way alone to and from the village. Usually a large basket or bundle is on her head and carried with unconscious ease while she swings her long bony arms or places her talon-like hands akimbo on her hips. Her career has been one of steadfast activity and industry. Many are the comforts she has around her which have been earned by the sweat of her brow. She is always dressed in spotless attire, and when visiting wears a purple calico frock and a bandana handkerchief of such lofty proportions that she resembles a walking church steeple. One hundred and five years will make a mummy of the human face, whether it has been handled in death by the ancient Egyptian method or in life by the ordinary process of nature. "Mauma's" visage is a verification of the fact. The black chin is crumpled and drawn into thousands of criss-cross lines, the jaws are sunken, the toothless mouth caves in, her black hair hangs alone so that she has been left by the disintegrating finger of time, for they shine and twinkle with supernatural luster as if they knew everything from the pom-pom days of George Washington down to the hair-skelter days of Booker T. Washington. Mauma still drops a "kerchey" with the same old-time dip that she dropped it a century ago. She is white-headed in her pertinacity to the low-country lingo of her youthful days. Her great-grandchildren, graduates of the village school or of Claflin university, are unable to comprehend her, but owing to her only son, "My Ed'ard," an urchin of eighty summers, has to be called forth to serve as interpreter. "My Ed'ard" is white-headed now and toddles with a stick, but his filial devotion has never failed. This, no doubt, is owing to the "old-time" manner in which he was thoroughly disciplined.

At sundry times since freedom Mauma has experimented in the delicate details of domestic science in the houses of the village folk, but owing to an extreme sensitiveness of nature, and a pride inherent from her long descent, has never tarried long. It is not uncommon in the best regulated families for the mistress of the mansion to tremblingly ask her domestic to be so kind as to look around for a silver spoon or a pair of scissors that is missing. The mistress who has unsuspectingly made the appeal to Mauma soon found that they had lighted a fuse that meant explosion, for soon a general crashing and rattling in the lower regions and Mauma, drawn up to such a height of dignity that her calico skirt would rise a foot in the air, exhibiting a pair of hickory-stick hanks below, would stand in the center of the house and, in a voice quivering with righteous wrath, call on the Almighty to witness her honesty; she would declare that "I belong to de Pickens family fifty years and none ob dem ebbas so much as 'spicion mel' I's po, I's ole, my massa done dead dese years, dem waving dem ever her head, 'is all de cha-rick-ta I's got to mek a libbin' I nebba stay nowhar if people spee mel'.

The entire family would humble themselves by asking pardon and assuring Mauma that no reflection was cast on her honesty, and that her character had indeed been regarded with immaculate; that only an innocent question, such as might have been made by any member of the household, had been asked. Mauma, deaf to all excuses and reparations, would then the outer door from her heels and disappear as if shot from a cannon.

Such scenes as these give some little idea of the natural pride of the old woman. It is when Sangua Henderson visits that she shows her affability and friendliness of disposition. It is then that she entertains her friends by the hour with interesting incidents in her long and varied career. Mauma is a firm believer in "hants" and witches. On one occasion, when the Edgewood house was crowded with guests, she was making up a great four-post bed in the west room, and as she turned down the coverlid she discovered the celluloid leg of a Confederate officer who was a guest in the house, and, finding the leg had been riddled with iron crutches that morning and had forgotten to replace it in its box. Mauma's idea was that the house was bewitched and that this was a real flesh and blood leg which the outer could take off and on at will. Her exclamation was: "My G—! White man tek off he leg and left him in bed. I leab my miss' house. It's gwine, and she departed, and was not seen again for a week.

Her mother was an African princess and became the property of a James Island planter. Even in her civilized surroundings she wore rings in her ears and rings in her nose, and was as proud of her blue bead necklace as she sat on the bullrush mat at her front door as is Mrs. John A. A. of her diamond necklace when she sits in her box at the Metropolitan opera-house. Mauma's recollections of childhood are all associated with James Island, where she first saw the light of day, and where she sported in the cotton fields until Governor Pickens, in the year 1830, bought her from the Macklehenry estate. It was then that she bade farewell to the low country and the "big water," to which she has never returned, for Edgewood has been her home ever since. Her first step in life's advancement was to marry "Old Man Harper," Governor Pickens' coachman, and a most original and picturesque character. After this Mauma was installed as maid and nurse to beautiful, historic Edgewood.

Numerous are the incidents she relates of her connections with this family, and she served with devotion the three successive wives of Governor Pickens. She tells of her master's kindness and generosity to his hundreds of slaves, and their love and fealty to him.

After the war between the states and when the governor was no more, his beautiful widow was most solicitous of the welfare of the people who had belonged to her husband, and frequently helped them with her charities.

Mauma worshipped the ground she trod on, and often visits the graves of her beloved mistress and her only daughter, "Miss Douscha." Her greatest happiness now is to visit Governor Pickens' grave, and to hold "Little Missy," infant in her arms. She coos softly to him the baby lullabies she sang in the days of the governor's nursery seventy-five years ago.

ABOUT GRAPE FRUIT

How to Select It and the Best Way to Prepare It for Serving.

New York Times.

In selecting grape fruit, the safest general rule of choice would seem to be to judge by weight. Other things being equal, the heavier one of these golden globes the better. If relatively light in weight it will be found juiceless and unsatisfactory. Color, skin, texture, rust and other superficial indications may be guides, but if so they are not infallible. Grape fruit should not, as a rule, be eaten fresh from the fruiterer's stall. If kept in the house a week or ten days, open to the air and in an equable temperature, it improves beyond recognition. Until decay begins, the softer it is the better.

The way of preparing the grape fruit in which it is really the most delightful is one which few know, and fewer would practice, since it involves a great deal of trouble. It is: Remove the yellow skin by close paring, and then peel away the white skin until the pulp sacs are exposed and divested of all the bitter integument. Then very carefully separate the segments one from another.

They act like Exercise.
