Boxing Instructor of the Kaiser's Family Writes Interestingly of Experiences.

BY J. P. SLIM, Eighteen Months in the Service of the Emperor at Potsdam.

I was present in the mob one night, and heard their wild talk. I had also the experience of being charged by the mounted police, who were powerless to disperse the crowd because of the low iron railings which fenced all the paths of the Tiergarten.

Next evening I was summoned for my lessons to the schloss itself, the princes preferring to remain there with the Kaiser. While there the mob again gathered outside and shouted for the Kaiser to come out.

I was left by myself in an apartment looking out upon the crowd, and saw what happened, though I only heard from Prince Oscar afterwards what actually took place.

"I will go out to them," the Kaiser suddenly announced. His sons and members of the court endeavored to dissuade him.

"The dirty swine," said the Kaiser to his sons after it was all over. "I knew they would not dare to raise a hand against me."

"My first introduction to life in the palace of the Kaiser was an event one, which I am not likely to forget as long as my memory serves me.

My engagement as sports tutor to Prince Oscar was not many weeks old when I received one day a telegram from the prince, asking me to come without any delay to the Berliner Schloss, the official residence of the Kaiser, corresponding to Buckingham Palace in London.

At the same time a servant, who, because he was able to speak English, always waited upon me, came to announce that the car was ready.

"I am in question," was Prince Oscar's own remark to those of us who were with him, as he stepped into the car. "I may say here that while I resided at Kabinetshaus, was always reserved for my use, but the occasions on which I was called upon to appear in public, and always rather exciting, were rare, and I concluded very happily.

"This article was written to show how the people of Richmond are doing their bit to defeat Kaiserism by giving pleasure to the men called by the strange drills of the past few months in army camps, and are lending their co-operation in developing a high morale which will be most noticeable when the time comes to strike the death blow."

on either side of the entrance, and through those two rows I had to pass. A glass door shone at the end of this vista of funkies sitting and smoking, and I made hastily for this, giving it a good hard push in my haste to escape from the ceremonious servants.

The confusion this incident begot in me was not assuaged by the fact that I immediately recognized in the victim of my unintentional assault no less a person than the crown prince.

A row of guardsmen, standing stiffly at the salute in the inner entrance, showed me that I had been over hasty in supposing the respect of the funkies was excited by my appearance; they had been "arred" of the fact that the crown prince was coming, and their staleness was all intended for his benefit.

I fled inwards, past the saluting soldiers, anywhere to escape from the confusion in which I had fallen, and rushed along several passages before I recovered my self-possession in any degree.
