Faces Court Fourth Time IN BATTLE FOR HIS LIFE

Murder Committed Sixteen Years Ago Is Again Being Heard in Chicago Courts.

CHICAGO, November 2.—Where are the hates of yesterday year? Sixteen years ago last September, 1902, Roland O'Shea shot and killed Amy Howenson O'Shea, his twenty-one-year-old wife, and tried to kill himself in Humboldt Park, opposite the girl's home. She had been living with her parents, who objected to the marriage. It was two years before O'Shea recovered from his self-inflicted wounds sufficiently to be tried, but when the trial finally took place the flaming story of human passions filled columns of the papers day after day. The young wife's father and mother told of her secret marriage, declared her husband had never been able to support her, and recounted his constant annoyances of her and of them. A girl friend, Miss Jennie Custy, told of his furious jealousy and repeated threats he had made. Young O'Shea retorted with the story of the obstacles he said his wife's people had put between them, and declared he was driven temporarily insane by fear of losing her. So bitterly was the case fought on both sides that the jury disagreed and the whole thing had to be gone over again. It was gone over from the beginning, not once, but twice. Once the state jury and repeated threats he had made, the Supreme Court ordered a new trial. That was eight years ago, but the clerk in Judge Cavanaugh's court laid a dusty, yellow file of papers on the judge's desk and called for the fourth time in fourteen years, "State vs. O'Shea."

A little group of men stepped forward, the last time was in 1910, and again there was the defendant himself.
