CHAPTER X—Continued.

Katherine said nothing. She waited for him to continue. Nevertheless, her heart began to beat a little nervously.

"It is quite true," Haverford said, after that little pause, "my mother is your guardian, or rather was, for in future I intend to relieve her of that office. You are her niece by marriage. Your mother was Gerald Baynurst's only sister. From what I can gather, this sister must have been very dear to him. I am really as much a stranger to my mother's life as yourself, Miss Graniger. Beyond knowing that she married Mr. Baynurst after my father's death, I have never been informed—I may add that I have never cared to inform myself—about anything connected with this marriage. So I can only give the bare outline of your story."

"He passed again, and this time Katherine spoke, her voice sounding very low in her own ears.

"Of course, my mother and my father are dead."

"Yes; your father died before your uncle," Haverford answered. "Your mother, apparently a very delicate woman, was left in the charge of her brother Gerald, and he was also appointed your guardian. When he died suddenly this charge passed on to my mother."

"He ceased speaking abruptly. It would have been difficult to grasp from his tone whether he judged his mother harshly or not.

"I hope to get you more details," Mr. Haverford said, when he spoke again.

"As a matter of fact, I have brought down with me a quantity of old letters and other papers, which I dare say will throw some light on your early history. You seem to have been quite a baby when your mother died, and you came to England when you were a little child between three and four."

"Then I must have been immediately taken to Miss Bealish, my old schoolmistress."

"Yes; my mother tells me you were placed in a school. She explains this rather strange proceeding by telling me that Catherine was at the time smart and delicate child that her whole thought and care had to be given to him, and she herself was in such a poor state of health that she was not in a condition to charge herself with too much responsibility."

"Katherine Graniger laughed. It was not an unkind laugh.

"No," she said, "I am sure Mrs. Baynurst never did care about responsibilities," she said.

"She stooped forward to push some of the parcels more securely on the opposite seat, and the color rushed to her face as she asked him another question.

"There is no one here, would you like to know," she said, "that I have been kept by charity all this time. Did you find out anything about that?"

"They were close to the gates of Yelverton now, and Rupert Haverford answered her hurriedly.

"You touch on a rather important phase of this matter, Miss Graniger," he said, "and I have more to communicate to you; but we cannot go into this properly now. As I shall be here for a day or so, I hope you will afford me an opportunity for speaking quietly with you."

"Of course," said Katherine. Then she thanked him, and indeed, she did feel grateful to him. It set her mind at rest, and through her heart to realize that all this time, when she had imagined herself forgotten (when, indeed, it might have been excusable if he had put her out of his thoughts), he had been working in her behalf.

Just before they rolled up to the big door she turned to him.

"I want to ask you something. Please do not mind me, but I have never known you to have agreed to stay with Mrs. Lancing. I believe I am going to answer very well, and you can't think how glad I am to be with the children. I do see now," the girl said, quickly, "that I ought to have referred the matter to you, but the circumstances were against me. It seemed such a wonderful chance for me to find work in such a moment."

"Of course, I am not angry," Haverford said.

He helped her to alight, and carried all her parcels into the house, and as Mrs. Brenton came to meet her, she greeted Katherine with a friendly smile.

"She was conscious of a great desire to be alone for a few moments, for there was a pressure on her heart, and she hardly felt prepared to meet the children's searching eyes. Betty could ask the most pointed questions at times.

"As she put down her packages in a heap on the table she found she had carried up with her a large brown glove. It was warm still with the imprint of the man's strong hand; he had drawn it off to pay the driver, and it must have fallen among her parcels.

Katherine picked it up and stood a little while holding it; she derived, quite unconsciously, a definite sense of pleasure from the touch of this glove; it recalled the owner so clearly.

"I am so glad he did not forget," she said to herself, "it is so nice to be remembered."

CHAPTER XI.

Miss Graniger did not go down to dinner that night. When bedtime came Baby was restless and seemed inclined to cough, and Katherine became immediately anxious.

"Mrs. Brenton came upstairs, however, and reassured the girl. She administered homely remedies, and prophesied that all would be well in the morning.

Then she tried to persuade the young governess to go down to dinner, but failed.

"If you won't mind, I would so much rather stay here," the girl said. "Baby likes to hold my hand, dear little soul, and I should not be a bit happy if I went downstairs and left her."

"Well, do as you like, my dear," Mrs. Brenton said, and she added, "I am so glad you had a lift home this afternoon; now my party is all complete except for Camilla. I am very vexed with her."

Katherine looked at her quickly.

"Why?"

"Well, she ought to have come down this evening as she promised," Agnes Brenton answered, impatiently; "she arranged to meet Rupert at a certain time, kept him waiting about for an hour and a half at the station, and then, when he supposed she had come on here by some mistake, he follows her, only to find a telegram saying she has gone to Lea Abbey and will not be here till to-morrow in time for luncheon. I cannot think what has induced her to go to the Berdolphs." Mrs. Brenton added, irritably, "She says it is because Lady Pamela is ill, and sent for her; but to my certain knowledge Camilla and Pamela Bardolph have not been seeing one another for months past."

Katherine followed Mrs. Brenton out on to the landing. She felt subdued, even saddened, as she listened.

"Of course, I am disappointed, but I am not thinking entirely about myself.

I am sure Rupert is far more upset and annoyed than his manner shows. Ah, well; by this time I suppose I ought to know Camilla too well to be surprised at anything she does. See that you have at all anxious about the child, don't hesitate to send for me."

As she was passing on to the staircase, Mrs. Brenton paused.

"Mr. Haverford has brought down a number of things for the children. He said he was going to send them up to you. I hope they will learn to grow very fond of him," said Agnes Brenton earnestly. "Do you know that he has made them two little rich people? He has settled quite a fortune on Camilla, and on her children. Nothing can touch this money; it is hers and theirs, whatever may happen. He has asked me to be one of the trustees for the children."

Once again Mrs. Brenton turned back as she was going, and kissed Katherine. "For all reasons," she said, "I deeply regret that Camilla has not come to us to-night."

It was a long time before Baby would be wooed into slumber, and even then Katherine did not like to leave her; not that she had assumed herself that the child was sleeping deeply and tranquilly did she go into the other room.

She only snatched a few moments to eat some supper. There was really so very much to do.

An enormous parcel of costly things had been sent down by Camilla for the children, and every one in the house had brought a little offering. All these had to be ticketed and tied up. No ordinary stocking would hold what she had made ready to put at the foot of each bed.

On inquiring, Katherine found that Mr. Haverford had sent nothing up to the nursery as yet.

After a while she dismissed the maid to go down to the servants' supper, and was busy scribbling and tying, when there came a knock at the door.

"Come in," she called.

As the door opened Rupert Haverford appeared. His arms were full of parcels as hers had been in the early afternoon. He was smiling, but the girl quickly noticed that he looked tired, as if he were worried.

"Mrs. Brenton said I might come up. I hope I am in time."

"Oh, yes," said Katherine with a laugh. "I am only just beginning to arrange things; but there be a scene to-morrow morning."

"Can't I help?" asked Mr. Haverford; "this seems far too much for one pair of hands to manage."

"I am sure you are," said Katherine, "and I particularly desire to have my share in making the children's Christmas a happy one this year, for they belong to me now in a sense."

Katherine colored.

"Yes, I know," it was almost unconsciously that she added, "and I am so glad."

His eyes lit up and his lips took an eager expression.

"Are you?" he asked; "well, then I ought to be content, for do you know, Miss Graniger, I have been hearing nothing but delightful things about you. Mrs. Brenton cannot say enough in praise of you."

"It is very good of her," said Katherine.

"No," she said, "I am sure Mrs. Baynurst never did care about responsibilities," she said.

"She stooped forward to push some of the parcels more securely on the opposite seat, and the color rushed to her face as she asked him another question.

"There is no one here, would you like to know," she said, "that I have been kept by charity all this time. Did you find out anything about that?"

"They were close to the gates of Yelverton now, and Rupert Haverford answered her hurriedly.

"You touch on a rather important phase of this matter, Miss Graniger," he said, "and I have more to communicate to you; but we cannot go into this properly now. As I shall be here for a day or so, I hope you will afford me an opportunity for speaking quietly with you."

"Of course," said Katherine. Then she thanked him, and indeed, she did feel grateful to him. It set her mind at rest, and through her heart to realize that all this time, when she had imagined herself forgotten (when, indeed, it might have been excusable if he had put her out of his thoughts), he had been working in her behalf.

TRADE FAILURES ABROAD

By FREDERIC J. HASKIN.

The most stringent in the money market naturally had a telling effect on our industrial concerns, and more than one manufacturer has found things slow in the great home market which has heretofore been his mainstay. With so much goods still unsold, the manufacturers could make the ill wind blow them good by sending their salesmen into foreign fields and placing their goods with other nations. There, not only is a ready sale to be found for them, but to judge from consular reports, the people are eagerly asking for them. Had we heeded these reports last year, over $2,000,000,000 might have been diverted from the pockets of European to those of American manufacturers.

If the people of the United States exported as much per capita, as the people of Netherlands, our annual export trade would amount to some $12,000,000,000; if we sold as much as the people of Belgium, it would aggregate nearly $8,000,000,000; and if we did as well as the people of England we would have over $3,000,000,000 to the credit side of our foreign trade ledger. As it is, our export trade annually amounts to about $1,200,000,000. This is not due to any lack of productive capacity on the part of the people, nor to any inferiority of the wares they have to offer the world. Extravagant consumption at home and a failure to meet conditions abroad are the things which have made us one of the smallest per capita exporters among the leading nations of the world. Even Canada, where conditions like unto ours obtain, has an export trade amounting to $33.87 per capita, where ours amounts to $20.41.

The daily reports from our consuls scattered throughout the world tell a woe-tale of the things we miss, of the opportunities which literally beg for improvement. The situation is well described by Maj. J. M. Carson, of the Bureau of Manufactures. He says that the reason for the relatively small share of the United States in the imports of her Southern neighbors, may be described by the one brief phrase—indifference of the American merchant, and the failure of the American manufacturer to appreciate the value of the opportunities that appeal to him. Every country, from Texas to the Straits of Magellan, is undergoing wonderful agricultural and industrial development, and needs vast quantities of our machinery, implements, and everything else that enters into the industrial economy of a growing nation. All of them are made in America, and the South American believes that "made in America" is the best hall mark of trade. They want to buy of us, and the one thing which keeps them from doing so, according to Maj. Carson, is the failure of our merchants and manufacturers to meet their requirements.

The complaints that come in through the consular service are of failures to extend credits, failures to fill orders according to specifications, failures to pack goods so as to insure prompt and safe delivery, and failure to carry out shipping specifications. A six months credit basis is the established custom in South America, and whatever the people in North America may think of it, it is there to stay, and the only way to get business is to extend that way of credit. An instance of this kind is that of a Mexican wholesale house which ordered a carload of sheet zinc from an American zinc producer. When the telegraphic order was received, the Mexican firm was notified that the cash would have to be forthcoming before the order was filled.

SHEPHERD STATUE DISPUTE

Mr. Macfarland Would Place It Before Municipal Building.

Capt. Morrow, on the Other Hand, Will Oppose the Location if It Doesn't Suit.

Following the controversy which has been aroused relative to the placing of a statue of Gov. Alexander P. Shepherd in front of the new Municipal Building, Capt. J. J. Morrow, Engineer Commissioner of the District, yesterday issued a statement, in which he said that he has not as yet made up his mind either for or against the proposed location.

LABOR LOSES SUIT.

Supreme Court Upholds Writ of San Francisco Tribunal.

The Supreme Court yesterday denied the application of labor unions of San Francisco for a writ of certiorari for the review of the order of the Federal Court in California in enjoining the unions from interfering with the business of the Hammond Lumber Company, whose employees are on strike, and from intimidating its employees.

The effect of this action is to affirm the issuance of the blanket injunction, which applied not only to the Sailors and Marine Firemen's, Cooks' and Waiters' unions, but to their officers and members and all persons acting for them.

The strike began in the summer of 1906, when the unions demanded increases of $5 a month in the wages of the employees of the coastwise steamers of San Francisco. It was accompanied by much violence and lawlessness, the result of which was the burning of the city and the placing of the strikers and intimidating passengers.

FUNERAL OF MAJ. HART.

Services to Be Held at Late Residence. Burial in Arlington.

Funeral services for Maj. James P. Hart, who died at his home, 621 Maryland avenue northeast, Sunday, will be held this afternoon at the late residence, at 1 o'clock. The interment will be made at Arlington, with military honors.

Maj. Hart was born in 1835, in the aristocratic town of Washington, Pa. He came of a race of men which has long been prominent in the history of that country, and lived up to the name of that name.

Immediately after the firing of the guns of the Confederacy at Fort Sumter, Mr. Hart, with the enthusiasm which swept the North after that insult to the flag, enlisted as a private in the Ringgold Cavalry, an organization which became famous as the war progressed.

Through gallant conduct on many fields, Mr. Hart became an officer, and in 1863 he was made captain and commander of that famous organization, which was the Third street regiment. Later, Mr. Hart was breveted major. He was recognized as one of the most daring cavalry officers in the Union army, and some of the exploits of the Ringgold Cavalry are famous in the history of the civil war.

Maj. Hart came to this city about 1878, when he entered the public service at the time of his death he was connected with the War Department. His three sons, and five daughters survive.

TRIAL FOR MAJ. HANCOCK.

Officer in Coast Artillery Corps Will Be Court-martialed.

Atlanta, Ga., Jan. 13.—Maj. William P. Hancock, of the coast artillery corps, now stationed at Fort Barrancas, Fla., will be tried by court-martial, at the headquarters of the Department of the Gulf, on January 25.

The exact nature of the charges against the officers are being kept secret, but it is stated that they grew out of alleged drunkenness, involving a temperance pledge, which the officer is said to have made to his superior officer, when stationed at a post in Washington State two years ago.

It is also hinted that there is a woman involved in the case. Hancock is a native of Ohio. He entered West Point in 1879, and received his commission as a major in 1905.

JUDGE BRUNDIDGE IS DINED

Friends of Representative in Congress Give Him a Cane.

Remembered on His Fiftieth Birthday Anniversary—Going to Arkansas.

Washington friends of Stephen Brundidge, Jr., Representative in Congress from the Second district of Arkansas, and they seem to be legion, tendered him a small dinner last night—that is, the dinner was in a small room, comparatively speaking, to the halls of Congress—but there was really quite a large time present.

Mr. Brundidge, who is one of the leaders on the House Committee on Appropriations, has made a large number of friends in Washington, and some portion of this large number turned out last night to banquet him, because he is going to go back to Arkansas in a few days to undertake the prosecution of some law cases.

While it might be mentioned that Mr. Brundidge mentioned his feelings of friendship toward all present, it shouldn't be forgotten that he remembered Searcy, his own old home town—and that Searcy and some of its scenes came in for a large portion of Mr. Brundidge's talk.

Judge Brundidge had cause to think of his friends also, because, it being the occasion of his fiftieth birthday anniversary, a gold-headed cane, a token of esteem, was presented to him.

There seemed to be quite an impression rampant—whatever that means—that Stephen Brundidge, Jr., is an excellent fellow, and this feeling found vent in quite a number of words on the part of his friends. It wouldn't be exactly right to say more, only here's the menu, which will speak for part of the entertainment:

- Blue Points
- Olives
- Cocktails
- Consomme
- Crab
- Printanoe
- Filet of Florida Fish
- Roastende Potatoes
- Long Island Turkey
- Oyster Dressing
- Lemon Punch
- Mashed Potatoes

He was eighty-six years old, and had been a resident of Chicago since 1858.
