CHICAGO, 5; WASHINGTON, 3.

After twice coming from the rear and trying up the score on the White Sox and battling through five extra rounds without either team being able to score, the Nationals lost out to Chicago yesterday in the fifteenth inning.

It was indeed a hard contest to lose, for it appeared as though nothing but darkness would stop the two clubs from improving on their record of sixteen innings made the last time the Sox were here.

Although both of the local twirlers pitched ball that was above the average, Ed Walsh was steeper and his delivery so puzzling that had his support been clean no extra time would have been required for Chicago would have won in the regulation game.

Make Most of Errors. The Nationals simply availed themselves of all their opponents' misplays, and by playing a wonderfully fast game in the field succeeded in threatening to make it three straight from the former champions.

Two of the locals, George McBride and Clyde Milan, carried off the fielding honors by making plays that compared favorably with the most spectacular stunts performed at National Park this season.

Nationals Score First. The Nationals got a run in the first inning that kept them in the lead until the fifth. Walsh soaked Milan on the arm, and after the runner had advanced on a hit by Shilke and Ganley, Bob Unglaub tripled to the clubhouse, sending Milan home.

For four innings Charley Smith went along in good shape, but in the fifth he weakened after two men had been retired, and before he could get the third out the Sox bunched four singles for a pair of runs.

In the seventh the Nationals tied it up. Pickering swung and after McBride had flied out Street hit to right and when Hahn fumbled the ball Pickering reached third. Working with Clymer, who was sent in to hit for Smith, Pickering attempted the squeeze play, but the batter missed the ball, and the runner was out by yards.

Two on in Fifteenth. The Nationals wasted hits in the ninth and eleventh innings and in the fifteenth threatened to score when Milan and Tannehill each singled, but Milan was thrown out at third and Ganley went out to short.

YESTERDAY'S RESULTS.
