WINNING WIDOW ENTHRALLS POLICE

Detectives Convinced of Their Own Meanness.

MRS. OLIVER TELLS HER WOES

Story of Pretty Young Woman's Arrest on Charge of "Mean" Philadelphia Man, Trial, and Final Vindication, and Return to Washington—Cells at Headquarters.

Armed with a bouquet of long-stemmed white chrysanthemums, which she coddled in her arms and rubbed against her cheeks, Mrs. Edythe Oliver, a widow of twenty-three years, invaded police headquarters last night and told of a thrilling experience, which, she said, should be a warning to all young women.

Ferried from the corner of a desk, the pretty widow held a corps of detectives and as many newspaper men in blissful captivity for more than half an hour while she told the story of her arrest on a charge of larceny, removal to Philadelphia in custody of "mean" detectives, "cruel" trial, and then complete vindication of the charge against her and an overwhelming victory over the man who accused her.

It was a dramatic story she related, and her witty repartee and flashing brown eyes threw consternation into the office force, so that the routine of police headquarters was shaken, almost upset. Several valuable papers and a book of official records were misplaced, and it was several hours after the young widow departed before the regular procedure of the office was re-established.

Seemed a "Nice Man."

Mrs. Oliver lives at 909 H street northwest and is the daughter of Peter Rudolph Oliver, an employe of the Pennsylvania Railroad. About a year ago, she said, she met William Greenwald, a traveling salesman who stopped over in Washington. Greenwald appeared to be a "nice man," asserted Mrs. Oliver, and when he left this city he wrote her letters. She answered, and then he wrote her that he had obtained a desirable position for her in a Philadelphia department store. "Wouldn't she come over to 'Philly'?" asked Greenwald; and the offer was so flattering Mrs. Oliver went.

Greenwald gave her a diamond ring and saw her properly established in a respectable boarding house, for which she thanked him "very much," but the traveling salesman said something to her which she did not like. She even felt hurt, and decided to return to Washington. "No money and no friends here," contemplated Mrs. Oliver, probably pouting prettily. "What must I do?" with an emphasis on the "must."

"Oh, I know," she decided and straightway bought the ring for $25, purchasing a railroad ticket and returning home. Greenwald felt rather bad about it and asked the police to arrest Mrs. Oliver, which was done. Two "mean" detectives went to her home, told her she was under arrest, and asked her to go to Philadelphia to answer a charge of larceny.

Mrs. Oliver wanted to stay in Washington, but she consented to accompany the detectives, and on Friday last saw her in the prisoners' dock before Magistrate Scott, in Philadelphia. Greenwald took the stand and said "mean" things about Mrs. Oliver, but she said the "wardman" true," and Magistrate Scott believed her.

Magistrate Waxes Angry.

The magistrate waxed angry, and said to Greenwald: "You brought this girl from Washington, and she pawned the ring you had given her to return home. All for $25 you come here and hold yourself to public ridicule. You don't seem to have a bit of shame. What kind of a man are you, anyway?"

Then the magistrate turned to Mrs. Oliver and told her she was released and could go home. She faintly. Two policemen picked up the limp form and carried it from the courtroom. Mrs. Oliver became hysterical, but her father soothed her and brought her home. She had no sooner reached Washington than she started for police headquarters.

She first convinced Inspector Boardman that "detectives were mean men," and then she started to convince the detectives. When every man in the Central Office had been "convinced," the young woman commenced operations on the newspaper men, and found them easy victims for her clever arguments.

When she finished talking to the reporters Mrs. Oliver bade a smiling adieu, swept out of the office with a wave of her chrysanthemums, and catching up her blue tailor-made skirt, strolled serenely out into the night.
