DR. W. AUGUSTUS PRATT'S GREAT WORK

The Famous Surgeon and His Work in Correcting the Unfinished or Badly Done Work of Nature. Plastic Surgery a Boon to the Human Race.

As between medicine and surgery, according to the statement of Dr. W. A. Pratt in a recent magazine article, the science of herbs and extracts has not kept pace with the gentle art of improving the condition of mankind by use of sharp little knives.

Yet Dr. Pratt gives away the secret of modern surgery; he admits it is solved by chemical formulas.

The great Frenchman, Lavator, described the qualifications of a surgeon as one having "the heart of a lion, the eye of an eagle, and the hand of a lady."

But all these attributes would be futile without anesthetics. The chemists who have recently given Antiphotolids to the scientific world, preventing pain or soreness during the healing process, have made it possible for the "heroic treatment" to be classified as "scarless surgery."

"Last, but not least," says the article, "the modern chemist has given us Thiosinamine, which disorganizes, softens, and causes absorption of sclerotic or scar tissues."

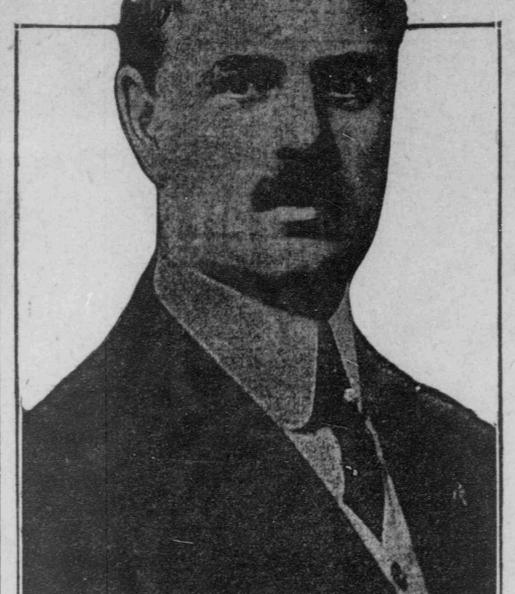

"With surgery sheared of its pain and its dangers from an infection standpoint, combined with the preventive influence of antiphotolids and thiosinamine, if required, it is easy to understand the main reason why operative surgery has advanced so rapidly during the past few years."

Few Anesthetics Administered.

"The past year, through the efforts of the chemists, in the larger hospitals throughout America and Europe, especially in Vienna and Paris, a general anesthetic is comparatively seldom administered. All kinds of external as well as internal surgical procedures are now being performed by the aid of the chemical agents, the most commendable as local anesthetics. By this means appendicitis operations and other major operations on the lungs, heart, and other internal organs are being performed daily."

"All these attributes lead up to the perfecting of plastic surgery, which has made the greatest advance of all. With surgery being performed without pain, without danger, without scars, it is quite easy to understand why face and feature surgery has made such rapid progress in the scientific world. The modern plastic surgeon, versatile, skilled, and experienced, with all these modern products at his command, can do to-day within a few moments what used to take years to accomplish."

"While a few years ago it was customary for an individual to carry an imperfect nose, lip, or ear through life, now it is fast becoming the exception. To-day an imperfection, whether from birth, disease, or accident, is easily corrected. A 'hump' or 'hook' is removed, the bridge of the nose is altered, or the nostrils are widened, and without the slightest pain or inconvenience. A crushed or dented nasal bridge is elevated and the nose molded into perfect outlines within an exceedingly short time, and the patient is ready to go to work and his friends are surprised to see him so well. Lips that are repulsive or unattractive are made as nature intended them to be, 'ornamental as well as useful,' and so through all the features of the face, the modern plastic surgeon, through the untiring energy of the scientific chemist, is to-day able to actually perfect the human features almost as readily as the modern sculptor can mold his clay or the modern artist draw features to his liking in order to produce his ideal picture.
