Story of Rosa Bonheur's Experience with an Whose Gentleman Garb Covered Detestable Quality.

Rosa Bonheur, they tell us, was a tireless worker, rising at 5 in the morning, and putting all day. She did not care to be interrupted, and always dressed in the simplest fashion.

One day it happened that ticks were sent for use that evening, and, as usual she was deeply engaged in the study before her, wearing her accustomed working garb, a long, dark blouse, reaching nearly from head to foot, and plentifully bespattered with paint.

When she was called, she rose as the shadow of a man, and she sat in her box as if she were indifferent as if at home among her easels and paint and brushes.

"Learn One Thing Every Day" No. 6. HENRY HUDSON

One day many, many years ago some Indians were out in a canoe fishing on what is now the Hudson River. Suddenly they saw a strange apparition coming toward them up the stream. It appeared to be either a big canoe or a wonderful wigwam. Quickly they paddled for shore, after seeing that there were people moving on this strange conveyance, and informed the rest of their tribe.

Contrary to the belief of many people, Henry Hudson was not a Dutchman, but an Englishman and a citizen of London. He was born there in the latter part of the sixteenth century.

Every day a different human interest story appears in the Herald. You can get a beautiful attractive reproduction of the above picture with the pleasant color and with this week's "Herald" in a weekly paper.

When a number of their fair-skinned guests had landed, he seemed to be the chief. He poured something from a bottle into a bowl and passed it to the Indian chief. This one solemnly sniffed it and then passed it to the neighbor.
