The wide skirt is cleverly draped at either side and the bodice, with its raglan sleeves, reveals a vestee of tulle and lace with collar to match, trimmed with bands of blue velvet ribbon.

DOWNPOUR HALTS WAR COLLECTIONS

House-to-house canvass here swells Jewish Relief Fund Despite Drawback.

Owing to the rain yesterday the personal donations received at the headquarters of the Jewish societies, which are raising funds to relieve the sufferers in the war-stricken countries of Europe, were smaller than usual. The collections for pledged amounts, however, were satisfactory.

The canvass to collect this fund is being made under the direction of H. Plotnick, visits being made to those who have pledged their aid in this cause. The personal contributions are received at the headquarters of the combined Jewish societies at Washington, 1255 Sixth street northwest.

The raising of funds for the suffering Jews in war-stricken countries was begun throughout the country more than a year ago. During the winter months collections were taken each week, but since the hot weather in Washington, the organizations have made only monthly visits.

A canvass of all persons who are interested in helping the sufferers has been made with a view to having them pledge a specific amount to be given each week. In this way there is a continued inflow of money. Amounts averaging from 10 to 25 cents are collected from each of the subscribers. In few instances large sums have been donated, but it is the idea of the directors of the work to spread out the collections.

In the past year more than $5,000 has been collected in this manner in Washington. The fund is turned over to the People's Relief Conference in New York which organization distributes it to the stricken territories. The amount collected in all the States in the country is said to amount to $1,000,000. A report of the amount collected in the United States will be issued some time next week.

HOUSEWIFE'S DAILY ECONOMY CALENDAR

UNIFORMS FOR SCHOOL CHILDREN

By FRANCES MARSHALL. A little forethought taken now regarding the youngster's school clothes will save a multitude of fretting later on.

Play-clothes for summer at home or on the country can be made in a variety of ways. The girls and boys have to start out before half past eight in the morning one must see to it that they are clothed in serviceable and neat suits and frocks.

In certain private schools there has been going on for several years a movement toward the simplification of school-clothes and in many of the schools even an actual uniform has been established.

Why not establish some sort of school uniform for your own children? It will greatly simplify your problem of dressing them and no doubt it will please the youngsters, who if they are normal, healthy children, do not love any too well the consideration of clothes.

For the little girl in school there is no uniform so suitable as the middie blouse or the sailor suit. These are simple, healthy, do not wear when the days are still warm, such a garment, made of linen colored cotton stuff, is very appropriate and for later wear navy blue serge is admirable.

For the boy, the sailor suit, made of blue serge, with a wide collar and cuffs can be used in which separate broad white placket collars and cuffs can be arranged.

The whole idea in dressing children in this sort of school uniform is to simplify their daily task of getting ready for school, to give them the feeling of being suitable and well-dressed at the expense of the least amount of money and the least amount of time and worry.

Whatever your choice for your son's school clothes, see that it is a simple, standard style. There is very poor economy in buying some freak suit, even if for that very reason you do get it at a reduction bargain. If you select a blue serge sailor suit, see that he is amply provided with easy-fitting, cotton collars and two or three wide black ties.

Most boys do not wear such an elaborate school costume, however. But even though he goes to school in a khaki suit of the simple pattern of khaki, see that he has enough of these simple garments to permit of frequent changes, so that they are always provided with their full quota of buttons.

For the boy of indolgent his taste for freak clothes, for clothes too like those of his father to be appropriate to his age, for neckties that are many-hued and elaborately designed, shirred, really bad taste. It is the same sort of error as to permit the little girl to wear jewelry to school just because she fancies it or because somebody may have given it to her for Christmas or a birthday.

ment of simple household accomplishments. Marie's father was as simple and pious as she is shown by the fact that when he learned that the young prince had chosen—or had he chosen for himself—his daughter as a wife, he returned to his home, and entering the apartment where he and his daughter were sewing, said: "Let us kneel down and return thanks to God. You are Queen of France."

A few days later, after the Bishop of Rochefort had tendered the princess the official proposal, she wrote, saying: "I am betrothed to the young prince, the Cardinal, for the honor done me by the King of France. My will belongs to my parents and their consent will be mine."

The Daily Adventures of PUSS IN BOOTS, Jr.

By DAVID CORY.

Puss Junior Meets a Game Warden Who Gives Him Good Advice.

"The robin and the redstart, the robin and the wren, if ye take them from their nest, ye'll never thrive again."

Puss Junior pulled in his good gray horse. Whose voice, he wondered, was singing this good old Mother Goose rhyme? He sat very still and listened:

"If ye touch one of their eggs, bad luck will surely follow."

"Well, I'm not going to rob any bird's nest," he called out; "neither will I touch a little bird."

Pointing to a little village in a pretty valley.

"Nobly spoken, my fine cat," cried a voice, and a game warden came from behind a tree and stood in front of the good gray horse. "You have a fine steed," he continued, looking over Puss Junior's mount with a critical eye; "he must be a good roadster. He has a deep chest and well formed legs."

"He has carried me right nobly upon my journey," replied Puss. "Would that I were near the end of my quest."

"And what is that, may I ask?" inquired the game warden, resting his gun against the tree and filling his pipe with tobacco.

"I am seeking my illustrious father, Puss in Boots," answered our little hero. "I fear I cannot help you," answered the game warden, puffing away at his pipe and looking off into space as if he thought by chance Puss Junior's father might suddenly appear.

"That is the trouble," cried Puss; "no one seems to be able even to direct me rightly. Not yet have I had the slightest clue as to where he lives."

"There is a very wise man in yonder town," said the game warden, pointing to a little village that lay some two miles distant in a pretty valley.

"But I'm not seeking wise men," said Puss. "I'm trying to find my father."

"I know that," answered the game warden, "but as this man is very wise he might know something about an illustrious cat. I'm only a game warden and have very little knowledge of that kind of animal. Now if it were a pheasant, or a hare, or a deer, or a boar, I'd tell you in quick order where he might be found."

"Maybe your idea is a good one," said Puss. "I will travel to yonder hamlet and inquire for the wise man and will ask him if he knows where the famous Puss in Boots lives."

YOUR WEDDING DAY And the Famous Men and Women Who Have Shared It.

August 14—Louis XV and Marie Leczinski.

By MARY MARSHALL. It sounds like a fairy story when we read that at the time of the choosing of a suitable wife for the French prince who later became Louis XV the names of 100 eligible princesses of Europe were drawn up by the French government and presented to the royal family.

There were princesses of every country of Europe—princesses poor and rich, beautiful and homely, pious and wicked. After the list of names had been read, these words, written, like the other comments on the list, by the courtier assigned to the task of investigating the princesses' claims: "Nothing disadvantageous can be said concerning this family; it was all, as far as I was able to see, however, that the princess was seven years older than the young prince; that she was as utterly devoid of a dowry as though she had been chosen from the family of the poorest of the King's subjects; that she was neither beautiful nor charming—not even clever."

Germany now has iron money in circulation.

Infantile Paralysis—Part IV.

So grave is the condition of a child suffering from infantile paralysis that every part of the treatment outlined herein is of the greatest importance. To continue the subject of the baths, the child must not be left alone in it for a second, therefore an assistant is required. Every moment of the time employed in the bath must be fully and advantageously occupied in order to prevent deformity and restore tone to the muscles. This requires constant vigilance because contraction of the limbs resulting in shortening is common, and relaxation, resulting in lengthening, is also seen. The limbs must be greatly exercised, and movements can be made in the hot water baths much earlier than they can be made in bed. First the thumb of a paralyzed hand, or the toes of a foot can be moved from side to side and to and fro. A partially contracted (drawn up) leg can be straightened out in the hot water with far less pain than out of it.

As the movements begin to come back, a series of exercises should be planned for the bath; a boat, a celluloid duck, a magnetic fish, or a rubber ball should be floated in the water and a game made to push it to and fro. For an older child, movements should be deliberately planned and the child constantly encouraged to do his best. He can push with the lame foot and hand, and how well it can do it in the water.

These exercises should be continued in bed, especially after the early stage, when the pain is less and the hot baths are no longer so necessary. They should be carried out in the form of play and be made attractive with offers of rewards and encouragements. It is cruel to threaten a child with lameness if it doesn't do as it is bidden; everything for the child must be done in a spirit of love and infinite patience, and all the exercises carefully regulated to suit each child's needs.

Beginning with three times and increasing the number by two each day, the following exercises are suggested for the limbs: Opening and closing the hands; rotating each arm, the mother supporting the little arm at the wrist if necessary; touching the shoulder, first one and then the other, with each arm; touching the top of the head with the hand, and then, forward, sideways and above the head for five minutes (any of the simple school callisthenics can be used). For the legs and feet, the following is suggested: While the child is sitting, moving each foot up and down and from side to side, raising one foot and placing its heel on the toes of the other; drawing the leg up to the knee and extending it; separating the feet and drawing them together again; kicking up in the air.

Many of these exercises can be practiced while sitting up in a chair, but it is most important to begin them at once while the child is still in bed. Gradually power will return to the paralyzed limbs, the child can sit up, move about, turn over in bed and raise himself. When he can be dressed and put in a chair, the deep water bathing can be reduced to one bath a day, but it should still be used for splashing and moving freely in.

To encourage greater freedom of movement, the child can be placed on a rug upon the floor, avoiding draughts and made to roll over, to crawl and creep after a ball, etc. For older children, any number of games and devices can be used.

ment of simple household accomplishments. Marie's father was as simple and pious as she is shown by the fact that when he learned that the young prince had chosen—or had he chosen for himself—his daughter as a wife, he returned to his home, and entering the apartment where he and his daughter were sewing, said: "Let us kneel down and return thanks to God. You are Queen of France."

A few days later, after the Bishop of Rochefort had tendered the princess the official proposal, she wrote, saying: "I am betrothed to the young prince, the Cardinal, for the honor done me by the King of France. My will belongs to my parents and their consent will be mine."

The marriage took place this day in the year 1725, the King being represented at the home of the princess by a young kinsman of his. And immediately afterward the little princess started on her way to the French court. Although history tells us that the princess was not clever, there is a quiet grain of humor in the letters she wrote home on the way. "Sometimes I am fairer than the grasses," she writes to her father. "Again I belong to the family of nine sisters. Here I have the virtue of an angel, there I am the most beautiful of the world. Yesterday I was the wonder of the world, today I am the lucky star. To dispel the illusion I lay my hand on my head and instantly find again her whom you love and who loves you very humbly."

It was not till September 4 that Marie first saw the fifteen-year-old prince, commonly agreed to be the most beautiful youth in France, who was to be her husband. The next day she was crowned with the King and the eager French court had a chance to inspect her. "The Queen makes very good appearance," wrote Voltaire at the time. "Although her face is not at all pretty, everybody is enchanted with her virtue and her politeness. She wears little rouge on her wedding day, just enough to prevent her from looking pale. She faints for an instant in the chapel, but only for form's sake. After supper there were fireworks, with many rockets, and the best invention of variety. For the rest there is a fearful noise, racket, crowd and tumult here."

After this wedding supper the Queen was conducted to her magnificent room at Versailles. There she passed the few hours of her honeymoon before her husband had led her to find enchantment in women who were more beautiful but less virtuous than she was. There she bore the king ten children and there she died.
